How to do Several Things.

Often when a tooth is so badly decayed that filling is impracticable, it is desirable to kill the nerve. Mix half a dram of white oxide of arsonic and one dram sulphate of morphia with a little creosote. Clean the cavity of the tooth before applying.

Chinese cement will join porcelain, glass, fancy work, jewelry, etc. so strongly together that they will break anywhere else rather than where cemented. Take of finest pale orange shellac (broken small) four ounces; strongest rectified spirits, three ounces, and digest them together in a warm place until dissolved. It should have about the consistency of molasses.

To clean tinware apply common soda with a moistened newspaper and rub with a dry piece. The tinware will look like new after this treatment.

Here are directions for dealing with a poisonous bite of any kind. Put a ligature above it to prevent a return flow of blood. Then scrape the wound or otherwise keep it open so that the blood will flow freely. This prevents the veins from carrying the poison into the system, and at the same time the free flow of blood tends to wash the poison out. It is a general rule that the more freely a wound bleeds the less danger there is of poison being absorbed.

President Harrison finds it difficult to decline—and he has not declined the recent invitations that he has received to visit the Southern Expositions which open next fall at Raleigh, North Carolina, and Augusta, Georgia. The people South treated the President so well while he was on his Across the Continent trip that nothing short of absolute pressure of public business will keep him away from the exposition.

A Wonder Worker.

Mr. Frank Huffman, a young man of Burlington Ohio states that he had been under the care of to prominent physicians, and used their treatment until he was not able to get around. They pronounced his care to be Consumption and incurable. He was persuaded to try Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds and at that time was not able to walk across the street without resting. He found, before he had used half of a dollar bottle, that he was much better; he continued to use it and is today enjoying good health. If you you have any Throat, Lung or Chest Trouble try it. We guarantee satisfaction. Trial bottle free at W, A. Schreiters Drugstore.

Electric Bitters.

This remedy is becoming so well known and so popular as to need no special mention. All who have used Electric Bitters sing the same song of praise.—A purer medicine dose not exist and it is guaranteed to do all that is claimed. Electric Bitters will cure all diseases of the Liver and Kidney will remove Pimples, Boils, Salt Rhume and other affections caused by impure blood.—Will drive Malaria from the system and prevent as well as cure all Malarial fevers.—For cure of Headache, Constipation and Indigestion try Electric Bitters—Entire satisfaction guaranteed, or money refunded.—Price 50cts. and $1.00 per bottle at W. A. Schreiter's Drugstore.

A Place To Grow Up.

Some years ago, Horace Greeley's advice, to "Go West, and grow up with the country," was thought not only a smart saying, but good counsel. It is no doubt such still, but its age counts against the same, besid which, there is no linger any unsettled West. The West is new, to be sure, but it has more thriving cities with water-works, electric street cars, eight-story buildings, and town-lot boomers, to the acre, than any other part of the country. For the man who has his fortune to make, the "New South," or the great state of Texas, offer opportunities not to be surpassed. In development, they are really newer country than the North west or the Pacific coast. To all points in she South. "The Burlington," with its own tracks to St. Louis and Kansas City, is the route beyond all others for the young or old man who is looking southward for a home. Chas. Langevin Sr. arrived yesterday morning from South Superior, Wis. to look up business matters. He is doing well in South Superior.

Maple Lake is becoming more popular each year. There will soon be a colony of a hundred people spending the summer on her beautiful shores.

Mrs. John Leveck and children were at East Grand Forks from Monday till yesterday evening. John never looked so lonesome in his life, but its all right now.

To strike Fosston the Duluth & Winnipeg would have to change the old route. Red Lake Falls is on the direct survey. If the road does not come it is our own fault.

A number of men started for Red Lake Tuesday to work on the drive. The steamer is now at work and soon a drive will be floating down the Red Lake river.

A large number of elephant struck people there are in town. Two thirds of our population turned out to Ringling Bros. show at Crookston and Grand Forks.

The Red Lake Falls brass band charmed the senses of the populace at Maple Lake yesterday. Not a few of our citizens spent the day there and shared the laurels with them.

Those vegetables raised by Mr. John Walters are not equaled anywhere in the state,—and even if John does refuse the NEWS when we send him a sample copy, we are bound to give him credit for his garden.

A. D. Wishard's land business is constantly increasing and sales become more numerous. The Brosseau farm at Gentilly was last week disposed of at a good figure.

Mrs. B. Zaiser is doing a splendid business in her millinery store. What more could be asked for than a big stock to select from, low prices and pleasant ladies to accommodate customers.

Mr. and Mrs. John Bottineau and daughter Mrs. Baldwin spent the past week visiting at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Bottineau. They returned to their home at Minneapolis to-day.

At St. Antaine's church, Terrebonne, twenty one children received first communion Sunday. The occasion was made a memorable one. Fr. Feige's church was filled to overflowing with sympathetic spectators.

St. John's day was never so slightly observed in Red Lake Falls within our recollection as this year, yesterday. None would have known that yesterday was St. Jean's day, from any perceptible change in the regular routine here.

Rufus Poirier and Frank Wilkins gave a dance in the Holtzknecht building on the North Side yesterday night in honor of St. John. The worthy saint doubtless felt much flattered. The dance was a success, largely attended by a hilarious crowd.

The demand for farm lands in Polk county was never so great as this spring. Hundreds of settlers from Dakota will harvest grain on Polk county fields this year. In the town of Wyandotte a large number of Scandinavian farmers have taken up land.

Tuesday night a handful of men gathered at the council room to discuss rail road matters. The convention came to the conclusion that Red Lake Falls didn't want any more railroads—wouldn't have them, in fact, and adjourned, without having accomplished anything.

Mr. R Stuhr was over from Euclid last week. Mr. Stuhr has gone into the sheepraising business, and this spring sold $500 worth of wool from one shearing. Many farmers might profitably follow Mr. Stuhr's policy. He is one of Polk county's progressive farmers.

We would like to mention all the people who went from here to Crookston and Grand Forks to the circus but our supply of type is not unlimited. Any further explanation we deem unnecessary, but will assure our readers that an additional supply of type to meet this emergency, will be laid in upon the advent of another circus.

The audacity of Crookston was never more forcibly set forth than in her last brilliant coup d' etat. She evidently nurses the idea that the county is either insane or greatly solicitious for her personal welfare (which would be synonymous) as a call to vote $220,000 bonds to aid in the construction of the Duluth & Winnipeg to Crookston will soon be made. It seems incredible that a sensible community would ask such a thing, but reliable authority says such are the facts. Fisher, East Grand Forks, St. Hilaire Thief River Falls, Fertile, McIntosh Red Lake Falls, will all be importuned to vote these 220,000 dollars bonds. Every resident of the county knows the enormous tax already shouldered by him, and is not anxious to increase merely to gratify the ambitions of Crookston. If Crookston wants that road, let her secure it through her own resources and not impeach the sanity of the remaining portion of the county by as much as hinting such a scheme as she proposes. Remonstrance seems hardly necessary. The negative vote will choke the project. It is so glaringly audacious that it borders on the rediculous.

pathy and comprehension of his motives and character rendered the process by which she set him apart and exalted him into a chevalier sans peur et sans reproche a simple evolution of sentiment.

Her most active and dominant thought in the matter was for Phyllis.

After some moments given to meditation, during which Royal watched her, conscious of naught so much as the relief of divided responsibility, she turned a troubled face toward him.

"It's positively awful, this happening just now," she declared. "I mean it's more disastrous than if it should have happened at any other time. You haven't got at all the complications yet: but you're a doctor and a member of the family, so I can speak quite freely, and can depend on you, I'm sure, to help me decide what will be best for that poor child in the other room. This calamity ought to be kept from her, and yet how we are going to contrive to keep it I can't see. Perhaps you may be able to suggest a way."

In her anxiety she ignored the fact of the marriage by proxy having really taken place, or rather she unconsciously allowed for it on a wrong premise. Dr. Royal himself she accepted pretty much as his namesake had accepted him, as a man who inspired trust and might help her out of a difficulty. The fact that so far he had proved himself more adroit at complicating difficulties than at furnishing solutions for them somehow failed of its proper impression. John Royal's death, for the time being, appeared to nullify all that had preceded it.

Royal now learned that for more than a year the girl had been under treatment for the disease which obscured her vision; that she had spent months at Mrs. Hart's house in Alexandria during the previous winter, in order to be near the celebrated oculist who had charge of her case, and who divided his time between New York and Washington. The case had progressed so favorably that the great man had appointed a day within that month—indeed, within the next fortnight—for the final and all important operation which would restore her sight or leave her hopeless forever.

Meanwhile, the strictest care had been enjoined to keep the patient bright and hopeful, to surround her with cheerful influences and auguries of promise. Nature must be induced to co-operate with science to effect a cure. Any sudden or overwhelming emotion, any violent change of conditions, either mental or physical, was to be specially guarded against. That was the reason why she had not been taken to the hospital to be married after the accident. Royal had feared contact with his own pain for her. For the same reason they had, with one consent, made light of the accident; for it had been necessary to tell her of it guardedly, because of a word or two she had overheard, and also to account for the fact of Royal's enforced delay.

It had not seemed worth while to postpone the marriage. Immediate possession of the money had been a matter of grave importance, and both parties were fully aware that it could be a marriage only in form until the great question for Phyllis should be decided. After the accident, indeed, John Royal had been more than ever insistent that the arrangements should stand. They had yielded to him and had kept Phyllis bright and interested about her plans, and so prevented her from thinking too much or growing anxious.

She had wonderful self control, poor child, and knew the paramount importance of absence of pronounced emotion; but what woman's self control would be equal to the strain which knowledge of her lover's death must put on hers? Then, too, she had been sustained in her efforts by consciousness that happiness for John, as well as for herself, was involved in her preservation of equanimity. And what will not a woman do and endure to make herself worthy in the eyes of the man who loves her? If this incentive and restraint should be removed, who could tell what disastrous consequences might ensue?

Mrs. Hart well nigh wrung her hands in her sympathetic appreciation of the difficulty of the situation. To be so near the goal and then have hope balked of fruition! And now when the loss of the money would make the recovery of sight more than ever a priceless boon! What could a blind woman without money be save a dependant all her days? And what a fate was that to contemplate from the standpoint of two-and-twenty! If only John Royal could have accomplished his purpose? If only the broken frame could have obeyed the heroic will! Mrs. Hart's tears fell fast from very pity and a swift realization of human impotence.

Royal's words surprised her:

"Was she much attached to her cousin?" He put the question in a low voice.

For attachment in the sense of lovers Mrs. Hart could not answer, but thought it improbable that that sort of ardor could now be a factor in the engagement. The pair had been separated for six years, and during that time it was reasonable to suppose that the youthful emotion which had drawn them together should have evaporated. That there existed, however, strong love between the cousins their conduct toward each other had proved. John Royal had been a quiet man, she had always heard, absorbed in his profession and ambitions of distinction therein; not a man of much worldly wisdom, nor much addicted to society. Phyllis had doubtless nursed her romance as much through force of circumstances as aught else; she had been brought up in the knowledge and belief that her cousin would be her matrimonial destiny, and during her most impressible years she had been held apart from forming any other attachment by the blight which had slowly and insidiously crept over her.

"It was that which prevented Miss Royal from summoning John home before," Mrs. Hart explained. "She was so anxious that Phyllis' sight should be restored before he should see her, and the disease was obliged to run its course. Anne liked to arrange the procession for her people down to the most minute details. She kept full knowledge of the child's condition from him, and I believe it was only just before her last illness, when the possibility of cure was at hand, that she took him into true confidence. And, as ill luck would have it, that letter did not reach John for months after it was written."

"Why did she make that iniquitous will?" demanded Royal, who felt that here he also had cause of complaint.

"God knows! I think, however, that it was made just before John sailed for Europe, and while the engagement was fresh with them all, and the young people very much in love. Perhaps her idea was to keep John true by making his cousin's future dependent on his constancy. When a copy of the will was sent him, after his aunt's death, and some indignation was expressed, John wrote us that he had been aware of its contents for years. None of the other friends was. They might have coaxed some reason and justice into Anne Royal if they had been. Like a great many women, she never talked about wills; she seemed to have a feeling that to make or even mention such a thing would be to prop the door open for death."

No one more than Hart Royal could appreciate the importance of satisfactory adjustments between physical and mental relations in cases like the present. He talked the matter over with Mrs. Hart, and, out of pity for the girl and an unconscious adaptation of their thought to the lines indicated by John Royal's conduct in regard to her, they decided that they would continue to shield her from knowledge of her bereavement until the operation should have been performed. It would be but for a short time, they thought, and no living being would be injured.

Of the property there would be no occasion to think for three months yet, as that time must elapse ere the executor would render his account. And of Royal's kindred there was none, accessible, nearer than Phyllis. His parents had entered into rest many years before, and of his two sisters one had died in childhood, and the other had married a missionary and gone away with him to some impossible place, where a letter would be months in reaching her.

They removed Phyllis to another hotel, where there would be no chance of her accidentally acquiring more knowledge than they desired for her. She had been told of the death of the stranger, and also that he was really a kinsman and alone in the world, which sufficiently explained the fact that John and Nina should decide to remain in Matoacca until after the funeral.

They followed him alone, those two, well knowing that if the still heart and quiet brain could respond to sentient thought or emotion John Royal's decision would be that it were better the guerdon of tears should be withheld from his memory forever than that the falling of the drops should dim one chance of light for the eyes of his beloved.

CHAPTER VII.

Royal had about completed his arrangements for leaving the hotel in which so much of import had occurred, when a chance remark caused his own position in this affair of his namesake to assume proportions and a complexity which well nigh overwhelmed him.

He was standing in the hotel office, near the clerk's desk, on which lay the open register. The young doctor stood at his elbow, the same to whose fledgling care John Royal had been committed. They had been speaking of the case and of its untoward ending, and had gone into details of interest and importance to no mortal soul save members of the profession. Suddenly the young fellow put a question:

"Were you brothers? Excuse me for asking, but the name is the same for both on the register," laying his hand on the book. "They've put the same initials, too. But that's a mistake, I reckon."

No, Royal explained, there was no mistake. The names were the same and they were kinsmen, but not brothers. He cast his eye on the register, as he spoke, and read beneath the name of Mrs. Walter Hart that of Mrs. John Hart Royal. It surprised him, for he had no recollection whatever of having placed it there. Then he remembered that in the excitement and hurry of the arrival he had neglected to register the ladies at all. It was probable that the clerk had supplied the omission from information obtained at the fountain head.

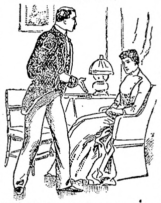
In the second which elapsed before he replied Hart Royal's mind seemed to work over the whole case, from start to finish, like an electric flash. He appeared suddenly confronted by a point of view the instantaneous absorption of which by his consciousness made it seem something which he had known all along, only failed to give it due prominence. The pause ere he spoke was so slight that it passed unheeded by the bystanders, but during it Royal's whole mental position, and a good part of his external circumstances, had been shifted.

"No," he made answer quietly. "The young lady is his cousin and next of kin. She is my wife."

CHAPTER VIII.



"Oh! it's tremendously funny, I dare say!" he growled.

"Poor child! Poor Phyllis!"

Mrs. Hart's face wore a compassionate expression, and her voice had tender, commiserating inflections. She stood by the window, looking out into the street with eyes which conveyed to her mind no image of that on which they rested.

Royal paused in his restless walk and silently gazed at her. Her tone made him wince like the touch of a nettle. He was too much oppressed by the result of his own precipitation not to be sore and irritable. Involuntarily he resented the implied depreciation.

"I am not a bad man, as men go," he remonstrated. "A blundering fool, if you will, but no villain. Your tone implies that I have been both."

Mrs. Hunt turned toward him. As she did so she caught an expression on the young man's face which reminded her curiously of her husband. Her eyes softened and a smile came to her lips. She had seen the look before during the days that they had been together, and always with mute, wistful acknowledgment of the tie between them. After all, he was Phil Royal's son and of their own people—which fact, in the lady's mind, considerably ameliorated the situation. What would have been her attitude toward Royal if, instead of being a member of the family with blood right of interference, he had turned out simply a blundering stranger, whose tender nature had ruled his reason to such disastrous effect, it is difficult to imagine. Fortunately for Royal she was not put to the test. A kinsman, like the shape of a nose, can be accepted and endured with the pleasing consciousness that, externally, the worst is known of him, while the introduction of a stranger into one's life may be attended with as grave risks as those incident to the French notary's experiment.

Mrs. Hart loved romance with a southern woman's love, and moreover she was gifted with a subtle sense of humor. Interwoven with the tragic and pathetic elements of the affair there was comedy as well, for those sufficiently disengaged to appreciate it. And, for the life of her, Mrs. Hart could not forbear imaginative pictures of the self complacent soul of her kinswoman, assertively comporting itself in the infinite, suddenly confronted with a view of the situation as it now stood. Even a disembodied spirit, in such case, could not escape recognition of limitations and acknowledgment of the futility of all arrangements for pulling stroke in the lifeboat of other people after this mortal shall have put on immortality. The pithy old Scotch proverb recurred again and again to Mrs. Hart's secretly diverted mind with a relishing sense of its applicability.

"What did the lawyers say?" she questioned, coming toward him, and tacitly ignoring her own discourteous exclamation and his impatient reception of it.

Royal pushed a chair toward her, but declined one for himself. In his nervously excited condition it pleased him better to tramp about the room. They had been in Alexandria a week, coming directly home with Mrs. Hart after John Royal's funeral, and during that time the dead man's substitute had devoted himself to discovering what might be his legal status in the affair. Of his case in equity he had no shadow of doubt.

"There hasn't been time enough for anything like research yet, and a lawyer is nothing without precedent," he answered. "I've seen a couple of fellows here, and stated the case hypothetically, and I've talked to a man or two in Washington besides. Of course I've only gotten horseback opinions as yet. Nobody I've seen has ever gone into a thing like this. One fellow told me plainly that he didn't believe such a case had ever even been imagined before."

"But the general impression was—what?"

Royal paused beside her chair, and stood looking thoughtfully down at her:

"As far as John Royal is concerned the case has but one point of view. They all agree on that. The proxy marriage was no marriage. Under the circumstances it couldn't be. A man in articulo mortis, as John Royal was at the time of the ceremony, cannot enter into a contract: the law wouldn't recognize such an act as conscious and voluntary. Even if he had lived it is doubtful whether the proxy marriage would have stood. It would have given us what we wanted, though—a fighting chance for the money. Marriages by proxy are so unusual that the law don't provide for differentiations of them."

"Then the marriage with John is null and void?"

"It's non-existent."

"And with you?"

Mrs. Hart looked searchingly up at him: she put out her hand to prevent him from resuming his restless pacing backward and forward.

"The marriage with me was genuine. Listen and I'll try to make it clear to you."

With allowance made for inaccuracies of understanding and statement due to lack of legal knowledge and a, perforce, prima facie reading of the case, the gist of that which Royal had gathered was this. Marriage was the special charge of the law, and by it regarded as the prime pillar of civilization, therefore every possible facility had been afforded people for entering the matrimonial state: the notion being, apparently, that the more marriages the more props—ergo, the more civilization.

In the present case the names of the two men being identical and age and appearance sufficiently similar to cause the license to fit either indifferently, and the woman having consented to marry the man she was with, the marriage ceremony, it was declared, had constituted them man and wife, and nothing short of a divorce could change the relation. The woman had designed and intended to marry her cousin John Hart Royal, and she had married her cousin John Hart Royal, and the fact that the man she had espoused was not the man to whom she had engaged herself could not militate against the stronger fact that she had considered the man with whom she had gone through the ceremony as the contracting party. This no subsequent declarations would change.

That Hart Royal by suppression of the fact that he was acting as proxy should have invested himself with entire responsibility as principal appeared to follow as a logical sequence. And any ex post facto effort to free himself from the consequences of his blundering might justly be considered as treacherous evasion, and would certainly be accredited to a discovery on his part that his impersonation of the dead man would be barren of financial results—would place him, in short, in the position of a baffled and malignant impostor.

"You see how it is," the poor fellow fumed. "I'm caught in the trap by both legs. If I hold to my marriage, I'll be foisting on a woman a husband she don't love and don't want, and that, too, when she thinks she's married to somebody else. And if I get a divorce in order to free her, she may think, and the world will say, that I do it because I can't get hold of the money. Nobody had a hint of the proxy business at the time, and nobody is going to believe in it now. I wouldn't myself if I were outside of it all. People will swear the whole thing was a plant from beginning to end, and that I'm shaking the bag because I've got found out. There never was such a confounded mess since the world began!"

He actually stamped on the floor in his impotence and bewilderment. Mrs. Hart's face was turned from him, but a suspicious gurgle and movement of her shoulders attracted his attention and changed the current of his thought.

"Oh, it's tremendously funny, I dare say!" he growled. "I don't see the joke myself, but to an outsider I suppose it's exquisite. 'Tisn't often one has the chance of rejoicing over a man wriggling in a dilemma like a worm in a woodpecker's beak. I'd laugh outright, though, if I were you. It's more decent than sniggering in corners."

A handsome face, in which amusement struggled with contrition, was turned toward him, and two hands were cordially extended:

"Forgive me, John, and don't be cross! I'm going to help you, I am indeed, with wits and will both. Only I couldn't forbear a quiet chuckle. You looked so preternaturally concerned and solemn and—and caught."

Royal was mollified. Few people could resist the charm of Mrs. Hart's manner; it was invigorating and comforting, like sunshine. Catching her eye he experienced a sudden and delicious revulsion of feeling, like that produced by a bit of commonplace in an abstruse volume. He bit his lip to keep from smiling.

"Nina," he rebuked, "the way you are taking this affair is positively subversive of morals. Instead of howling at me with indignation, and hounding on the populace with tar and feathers, you are acting as though the situation wasn't past mending. And I believe in your soul you are enjoying—yes, actually enjoying it with the flippancy of a gamin. What do you suppose is going to become of you in the other country if you don't fetch his folly home to the fool in this?"

His words were light, but they overlay considerable emotion. He was grateful to her with a gratitude beyond expression for her sympathetic comprehension.

"Something more satisfactory than endless psalmody or aerial progression, I hope," she smiled. "Mocking at those in sore straits and grievously tormented I hold to be my mission. Seriously, though, I am sorry for you—truly sorry. But after all, John, it isn't you that matters so much. The situation is and will be much harder on Phyllis. You did it, you know. When there is a smash up the man who holds the reins and does the breaking gets the most comfort out of the affair."

The mention of his cousin's name caused Royal's face to soften, and he let the blood relation frankness of his com-

The Philadelphia Record reports a singular sentence at Huntington, Pa. A wife had kissed "another" man, the husband had chastised her and the Justice gave a verdict that "the wife retire to her usual place of abode and lock the doors so that no strangers can be admitted for the period of six days; that the husband, for the same length of time, board with his next door neighbor and sleep in the barn, and that each party pay half the costs and stand committed until the sentence is complied with."

As Austria has admitted one woman doctor to her hospitals on trial the coming of the woman doctor in that country may be safely prophesied. All that the women need to advance themselves in the profession is a fair chance and recognition. They will have serious difficulties to overcome, however, where Mussulmans are numerous, as in some of the provinces of Austria, for the opposition to women doctors by the Turks is based upon religious prejudice, and that is very hard to overcome.

IOWA.

Lyman and Kirkpatrick's stallion, Royal Milton, died at Ottumwa. It cost $6,000 in Kentucky.

The annual summer meeting of the Iowa sheriff's association met at Cedar Rapids with about fifty members in attendance.

A gas well was struck six miles south of Spencer, on the farm of Wilson Hartman, while boring for water. Considerable excitement prevails.

An employe of Denecke & Yethers, dealers in dry good at Cedar Rapids, found what is believed to be a bomb in the rear part of the store. When found a fire in the bomb was burning.

An oat meal company has been organized at Mason City and will be incorporated under the laws of the state with a capital of $30,000. The most modern and approved machinery will be put in the four-story stone mill at Rock Falls.

Eleven passenger conductors on the Iowa division of the Illinois central were discharged upon their reporting for work recently. No reason was given them; but officials say dishonesty is the cause. Some of the men had been in the employ of the company for 30 years.

John Dunhouse, a house mover of Dubuque, cut the wires of the fire alarm system, by which a loss of $1,200 falls on the city by the burning out of the signal repeater, coils, arresters, etc. George Osborn, an electrician, was severely shocked and burned in handling the wires.

The temperance people are making another raid on the saloons at Cedar Rapids, and in the past few days nearly every saloonkeeper has been served with a warrant of arrest. Some have already appeared before justices, plead guilty, and paid their fines. About thirty-five cases have not yet been disposed of, but they will be attended to the first of the week. Selling of liquors go on, however, the same as ever.

The body of Prof. I. H. Bunn, who disappeared from Shell Rock recently was found floating in a little lake near that town. Prof. Bunn was one of the best known musicians in the state, but was somewhat eratic in his movements, and when he disappeared it was supposed he had gone to some of the neighboring towns. It is thought to be a case of suicide.

A special from Mt. Pleasant says: Grandfather Theodore Schreiner celebrated his 80th birthday at the Masonic hall by a large reception. Over two hundred invitations were sent throughout Iowa, and a goodly number of guests were present. He is well known throughout the state, having been the grand tyler of the grand lodge A. F. and A. M. the past 35 years.

The police of Ottumwa captured two burglars in the act of blowing open a safe in Jim Gither's ax and tool store. They gave their names as Frank Johnson and John Small. Two other alleged crooks, C. A. Bostwick and E. W. Reynolds, were detected with a gold brick made of copper, which they were evidently planning to use on some sucker, and a search of their quarters disclosed a whole outfit of burglars tools. They are supposed to be the gang who blew open a safe at Grand Rapids.

WORKING UP A DRINK.

The Hotel Clerk Was Onto the Little Game.

It was exactly midnight the other night when a stranger walked softly into a Broadway hotel and whispered to the clerk, who whirled the register around at him:

"Will you please tell me if Admiral Beaumont is stopping at this hotel?"

"He is not," was the reply.

"Thanks—exceedingly thankful," whispered the man as he tiptoed out.

Ten minutes later he returned with the same soft step and mysterious air to whisper.

"No such man here, sir."

"Thanks—many thanks."

This time it wasn,t over five minutes before he returned, and he walked on tip-toe to the counter and whispered:

"Sorry to trouble you again, but it is neither Admiral Beaumont nor General Thomas I want. It's Jones—Z. Jones."

"No Z. Jones here."

"No such man."

"Very well; I'll call again."

"No, you won't! Here—take it and go!".

The clerk handed out a nickel, and the man took it, bowed his thanks, and said as he softly tiptoed away:

"Yours until death! You know how to keep tavern, and you are onto the racket! Good-night!"—New York World.

A Delicate Question.

Revivalist—Have you got religion, my friend?

Hardened Sinner—Well, I've got some kind of a pain on my insides, but I dunno whether it's religion or a return of my old liver complaint.—Brooklyn Eagle.

PUT OUT OF THE WAY

The Man Last Seen Near Denver, Where He Had Been Delayed by a Wreck.

CHICAGO, June 23.—A royal messenger bearing important dispatches sent from Tokio by the czarowitz to the czar of Russia has mysteriously disappeared, it is said, while en route from San Francisco to New York.

The fact has been kept a secret, and it is not certain that the Russian government is yet aware of it.

G. Naterman, a member of the firm of Grosser & Co. of Yokohama and London, was on the same Pacific Mail steamship which brought the messenger to this country, and told of the disappearance for the first time at the Palmer house, where he and a number of well known German and English merchants of China and Japan registered on their way from Yokohama to Europe.

According to Mr. Naterman's account the messenger intended making no stops, leaving San Francisco for the East on the day of his arrival there. Near Denver, however, a wreck delayed his train and he stopped over night in that city.

He never resumed the journey and has not been since seen.

There are many reasons causing his steamer acquaintances to believe that the young Russian has met a violent death at the hands of Japanese enemies of the czarowitz. The most important of these is the hitherto unpublished truth regarding the attack upon

THE LIFE OF THE CZAROWITZ.

Mr. Naterman was in Tokio at the time and states that the truth was never made known because it showed too plainly the vicious character of even the highest class of the Japanese people.

The attack was not made, he says, because the Russian had desecrated a sacred temple. The czarowitz had accepted an invitation to visit a great noble at Tokio. On the way there he yielded to the importunities of another noble to visit him before reaching Tokio. His host at the latter city received this as an insult, and his desire for revenge stopped at nothing, it is alleged, not even the murder of his royal guest. An assassin was therefore hired to kill the czarowitz, and the resulting attempt was given to the world as the work of a religious fanatic.

From every stopping place the czarewitch sends duplicate dispatches to his father by three trusted messengers, who take the most opposite routes. One of these immediately after the attempted assassination was sent so St. Petersburg by way of the United States.

The theory advanced by Mr. Naterman and his friends is that the authorities, in a weak attempt at continuing the deception regarding the affair, have intercepted and put out of the way all the messengers supposed to bear news of the truth.

A RACE RIOT.

Italian Workmen Driven From a Laborers' Camp.

ST. LOUIS, June 23.—A race riot between laborers employed by a contractor at Workly camp, at the chain of rocks five miles up the river where the new water works are being constructed, occured early Sunday morning, in which one Italian was dangerly stabbed, twenty-two of his fellow countrymen driven from the camp, their valuables and money confiscated by the gang of American and other laborers making the attack, and a race war inaugurated.

The riot was primarily caused by the admittance into camp of a lot of Italian laborers and the report that Contractor Workly had gone to Chicago for more. All Saturday a feeling of revolt against the employment of Italian labor had been gaining in strength and bitterness. As soon as the laborers were paid off in the morning they congregated as usual at a saloon just outside the city limits, where bad whisky is sold.

About 1 o'clock Sunday morning the sixty or more drunken men went to the camp and sprang into the tent amidst the sleeping foreigners armed with clubs, knives and everything they could lay their hands on.

The fight did not last long. The Italians were at a great disadvantage, and after a b[illegible] resistence they fled in terror, leaving b[illegible]d all their belongings. They carried a[illegible] one of their comrades named Catalize F[illegible]cisco, dangerously wounded by a cut in the breast which threatens to result fatally.

The Italians made their way to this city where they reported the matter to the police. Their departure was followed by a scene of pillage. Their valises, bundles and packages were broken open and their contents taken charge of. The police investigated and made seven arrests.

THEY'RE AFTER MARSH.

Bloodhounds Will Be Put on the Trail of the Fugitive Philadelphian.

SPRING LAKE, N. J., June 23.—Several detectives arrived here to-night with hounds which are to be used in the search for the fugitive bank president, Gideon W. Marsh.

Marshal Leeds, District Attorney Graham and the detectives had a consultation tonight as to the best means to pursue to capture Marsh. The hounds will be let loose if it is possible to track the fugitive in that way.

Detective Freeman, who was slugged at a a cottage near Como, while trying to arrest a man supposed to be Gideon W. Marsh, fugitive president of the Keystone National bank, of Philadelphia, is very slightly improved this morning. Hundreds of men are searching the woods for Marsh.

The identity of the injured detective was disclosed to-day. His name is T. H. Garside, at one time a well known labor agitator, who two years ago conducted successfully the strike of the Russian and Hebrew cloakmakers in New York. For the past year Garside has been engaged in reportorial work on one of the daily newspapers in this city. His ability and acuteness became known to the government officials here, and some days ago Marshal Leeds commissioned him to search for Marsh.

Flags at Half-Mast.

INDIANAPOLIS, June 23.—The flags on public and private buildings are at half-mast to-day in respect for the late Joseph McDonald. The funeral will occur Wednesday, and promises to be one of the most imposing events occurring in Indiana. Telegrams of condolence are pouring in from all sources. The following was received from President Harrison at Cape May Point: "Mrs. Harrison joins me in offering to you and the family a most sincere sympathy in the great affliction which has fallen not only upon you and them but upon the community in the death of Mr. McDonald, and I regret that I am unable to unite with other home friends in the last office of respect and honor."

TRULY A TYRANT.

Many Acts of Cruelty and Oppression Caused by Balmaceda.

NEW YORK, July 23.—Many startling facts in connecsion with the revolution now raging in Chili which throw light upon the ferocity and despotism of Balmaceda are given to the public by three gentlemen who are Chileans, who arrived last week.

They have witnessed the conduct of the revolution from its inception and speak from actual knowledge. The stories of the three would seem to show Balmaceda is well termed the tyrant.

In Santiago, where his headquarters are, no one dares to utter a word against him. He has caused a cross of red to be painted on all the houses of people whom he suspects are not wholly in sympathy with him and into these marked houses his police and soldiers go at any hour of the day or the night. The people in these houses are forbiddon to lock their doors. No one is allowed to ride out on horseback through the streets after 5 o'clock in the afternoon. No three persons are allowed to walk the streets in company at any time of the day and no two persons can stand and converse on the streets.

It is a veritable reign of terror for those who have failed to cast their lot with Balmaceda. One of the gentlemen referred to was walking along the street past a jail yard. He heard some terrible shrieks from some one in the other side of the wall. He inquired of a soldier the cause, and was told that some of Balmaceda's soldiers were punishing a man who had refused to work for him by driving tacks into his hands and fingers.

He saw a horrible punishment meted to a Chilian who had been heard to say he was willing to work his hands off for the revolutionists. The poor fellow's hands were placed on a block and his fingers pounded to a jelly by a big hammer in the hands of a soldier. He was then told that he could go and work his hands any way he wanted to and for any one.

MURDERED BY A BOY.

A Youth Charged With the Murder of Little Annie Brunder Near Montrose.

DELANO, Minn., June 23.—The coroner's jury at Montrose, which has been investigating the murder of little Annie Brunder, the school girl found bound and dead in the woods, returned a verdict to-day, holding John Mazure, an eighteen-year-old boy, guilty of the crime.

Mazure has been spirited away by Sheriff Nugent, as lynching was feared.

The pipe and handkerchief found with the little one's dinner pail were recognized by his associates as belonging to Mazure.

Mazure had been fishing and was seen on the road a little in advance of his victim. He can give no account of himself from 4 o'clock in the afternoon until after 8 in the evening, during which time the deed was committed. The ground was all torn up and leaves scattered about, showing that a struggle had ensued.

The supposition is that the fiend first outraged the girl, and then, fearing that he would be complained of, added murder to his already dastardly crime.

The parents of little Anna are old settlers here and are highly respected and feel deeply the loss of their little girl. The whole family idolized her and are broken hearted.

The boy is a brutal looking fellow, and lives on the adjoining farm. When visited in his cell he was in a sullen and disagreeable mood and would not speak. He shows no remorse or sorrow for the death of the little girl.

DROWNED TOGETHER.

WASHINGTON, Pa., June 23.—While bathing in Doak's pond near here to-day John McKeown, Walter Jones and John Chanlis, boys ranging in age from eight to thirteen years, were drowned.

Young Chanlis dived from a plank, striking the bottom, and was drowning when John McKeown bravely dived to aid him. The half unconscious boy grasped McKeown tightly, fettering his arms.

Heroic little Walter Jones did not hesitate a moment, but leaped in to save his two little friends, but was himself overcome and all three, clasped in each others arms, sank to the bottom.

Young McKeown was a son of the late John McKeown, the ten times millionaire, and the boy was worth in his own right $4,000,000, being his father's favorite son. Chanlis was a nephew of the dead millionaire, and Walter Jones, son of Rev. J. F. Jones, presiding elder of the Washington district of the M. E. church.

This is commencement week of Washington and Jefferson college, and the sad affair will greatly modify the programme of celebrations.

CAUSED BY JEALOUSY.

BEVERLY, Mass., June 23.—Warren A. Shaw, whose wife keeps a boarding house entered the house to-night and shot Henry L. Roberts, one of the boarders, in the back.

He then shot Arthur C. Morgan, another boarder, in the breast, and one of his daughters who interfered was beaten over the head with a revolver. His other daughter, Lizzie, who came upon the scene at this time, was shot in the leg by the infuriated man. Shaw then ended his list of crimes by blowing out his brains. The cause of the shooting was jealousy. Morgan will probably die but the others are not fatally hurt.

A BAD BREAK.

One of them was killed, and Ward and Palmer, white, and Jackson, colored, were wounded fatally. They were all armed, having overpowered the guards and secured guns, and in the fight killed Pat Rowland and Jack Rankins, guards, and wounded Capt. Moreland, foreman, seriously.

Three of the convicts escaped, but one has been captured. Those at large are negroes.

IN THE SPRING.

Kind of curyus fixin'—when
Grass is fresh'nin' up again;
Buds are bubblin' forf, an' those
Lilac-bushes fably grows
Onderneaf your eyes—that you
Don't feel sap a-runnin' too.

Look like hair that's gittin' gray;
Ought to take an' blow away,
Leavin' room for new to grow,
Slick an' ily, don't you know!
Like young beech-leaves, just about
When they crowd the old ones out.

Yit some way—I can't tell why—
When thar's spring-time in the sky,
Showerin' shinin' right about
Like a gyrl that's in a pout—
'Stead o' hustlin', men-folks jest
Want to shut up shop an' rest.

Me?—I couldn't move to save
My old frame-work from the grave!
Hain't no idy 'cept to lay
Round an' ack like every day
Was a Sunday—holy, sweet—
Nothin' doin' 'cept to eat.

Wouldn't ef I could!—I low
It's a blessin' anyhow,
Sent from up above to call
Time on busy folks thet all
Tries tharselves to git ahead
Of the folks thet's idle-bred.

It's a gift o' grace: an' when
I remember worldly men
Unly hev spring-fever sent
To em' onct a year I'm bent
On my knees with thanks thet I'm Favored with it all the time.

AN ECCENTRIC HEIRESS.

Over the long brown level of the landscape the pink coats made vivid spots. The gray up-piled clouds parted here and there, giving a passage of silver lances of shining light. There was a sea wind at large, but it was tempered by intermediate spaces of sandbar and of dead stretch of meadow grass, shriveled and dry.

The hunt was over. The wind blew up more keenly.

"It's veering to the east," said the young man who rode at Miss Brocton's side, and who had managed to keep near her from start to finish. "Fortunate we had a capital day. There'll be rain tomorrow."

Nothing original in the remarks. But then why expect originality? Thomas Ashington Revery was a good-looking youth, who sat his mount well and was quite faultless in the matter of coats and collars, nails and hands and boots. What more could one ask?"

But Miss Geraldine Brockton appeared to have an attitude of asking the absurd, the impossible. Had she not onwed a million in her own right such peculiarities as hers—such marked, curious ways of looking at things—would really have seemed in questionable form. She was even as unseizable at every point as those long rays of silver-white light that filtered through the clouds and melted and were gone again as you looked. Here, a few moments ago, with the glad blood in her cheeks caused by the rapid motion, she had seemed vivid, animated, pleased with herself, and life, with her companion, perhaps. And now the latter had simply uttered a word or two in a softer strain, she had stiffened and frozen, abruptly, unapproachably.

"D——the whims of women!" said Thomas Ashington Revery to himself. "How is one to make headway with such a girl as this?"

When Miss Brockton had dismounted at her own door she went straight into the pretty room where she saw her chaperone, relative and companion, Mrs. Gwynne, making tea.

This lady glanced up, caught the look in the girl's eye and said:

"What has Mr. Revery been doing?"

"Doing?" Miss Brockton's magnificent eyes flashed fire. "Do you suppose I care what that creature does?"

"If you don't care for him he cares for you."

So that was the trouble again. Mrs. Gwynne had perceived at once that the girl was in one of her "moods."

"I shall advise you, Geraldine, to rid yourself of that prepossession of yours. You have grown morbid on the subject. You are quite capable of being liked for yourself, even if you are an heiress. Be reasonable. I suppose you are not prepared to be an old maid? Then don't ask too much of men."

Geraldine looked at her.

"I hate my money!" she said with a slow, vibrant intensity. "I hate it!"

"You think so?" said the girl coldly. "You are mistaken!"

She paused abruptly. A lad had burst into the room, followed by a young man tall and dark. This was Eddy, Miss Brockton's brother and pet, and his tutor. The boy began to chatter away to his sister, but the tutor presently said:

"Come, my boy."

"Shall I give you a cup of tea, Mr. Severn?" said Mrs. Gwynne.

"Thank you; no."

He was gone with the boy. Geraldine had not spoken. After a little she laughed;

"What a model tutor it is! How well he keeps his place!"

Mrs. Gwynne flushed angrily.

"I wonder at you, Geraldine! There are times when you seem lacking not only in feeling but in good taste! Mr. Severn is a gentleman—a scholar! More of a gentleman and undoubtedly more of a scholar than any Gwynne or Brockton, perhaps!"

Geraldine turned a little pale.

"How very cutting. How you take Mr. Severn's part! Happy Mr. Severn!" Then, abruptly, without warning of any sort, she bridged the space between herself and the little Moorish stand, and Mrs. Gwynne, in deep surprise, felt the convulsive clasp of two strong young arms about her neck.

"Oh, Aunt Martha! Aunt Martha! Aunt Martha! Don't mind me! Don't scold me! I—I—I am unhappy! And in doubt! I am so tossed about! So—so—"

"Why—why—Geraldine!"

But the storm—or that phase of it, at least—had passed already. Geraldine drew herself up. She set her teeth; her lips.

"But I shall not be any longer! I am resolved! I shall know what to expect!"

Her eyes shone, a brilliant smile flashed over the traces of tears. She opened the door and vanished.

When Thomas Ashington Revery called the next day, Mrs. Gwynne was constrained to tell him that Miss Brockton had gone to town.

"What! already? She told me she expected to remain out until the last meet!"

"Oh she is only gone in for two or three days," Mrs. Gwynne hastened to explain. "She told me that she wished to see her lawyer and her guardian." Mrs. Gwynne smiled. "You know she is a creature of moods."

Full well did Tom Revery know it! Did one ever see clearly how one stood with her? He departed crestfallen; inwardly fuming. She had seemed sometimes to like him well—very well, and she was certainly a very handsome girl, and he, well, he was undoubtedly in love with her, and there was the money! It appeared outrageous to the young man, whose own patrimony was less ample than he could have wished it, that a mere girl and a stripling should have inherited such wealth. That was the stripling riding by now, and the tall dark fellow with him was his tutor. It occurred to Tom Revery to wonder, in passing, whether the tutor ever saw much of his pupil's sister.

"Must be rather rough on the poor chap if he's susceptible at all!"

It was a week later, and Miss Brockton was not only at home this time, but had been sitting with Mr. Revery for nearly an hour.

There had now fallen over the room a heavy silence. It lasted only a few seconds, but the pause seemed an endless one. Miss Brocton had risen suddenly and was standing with an elbow against the mantel. As her visitor seemed helplessly to fumble for the fitting word, she repeated a little nervously:

"I am sorry—very sorry—for this misunderstanding. But—I—cannot marry you, Mr. Revery. I shall never marry at all."

At this unlikely statement the suitor regained courage.

"Miss Brocton! Geraldine!"

"No; it is improbable that I should ever marry. Of course, many men might be tempted to propose to me, thinking me rich. But my property will soon, by my own desire, be so disposed of that I shall have only a moderate income. Even should I marry, my will is so made that nothing I have, in case of my death, would go to my husband. So you see, such considerations may act as deterrents."

"Miss Brockton, you—you cannot think, it is not possible that you would believe me—" Revery was turning in rapid succession, from red to white, from white to red. The girl pitied his discomfiture.

"Not at all, Mr. Revery. I suspect you of no interested motives. But I do not care for you—in the way you mean."

Five minutes afterward she was sitting by the fire alone, a scornful smile on her lips that presently faded away and into a sigh. Some one came in at the door as she sat there, but turned again, retreating. At the sound Geraldine glanced around.

"Don't go, Mr. Severn; let me tell you of an interview I have just had."

She had started to her feet again, and stood in the attitude she had assumed a little before, with her arms resting on the chimney top. Dusk was coming on and the room was in a penumbra, save for the firelight. These leaping flames illuminated the face above them. Such a face! Arthur Severn felt dizzy for a moment. He had never seen her look like that. She had never flashed that smile, that eyebeam, upon him. She had never addressed him in that frendly, jesting tone. She was suddenly all life, all softness, all charm. She seemed to wish to atone for her sullenness, her arrogance. What a will o' the wisp she was! Changeful as a witch.

"An interview?" said the young man guardedly. He would not let himself go. He kept a tight rein on himself.

"With Mr. Revery; yes—fancy! I have all at once come to the conclusion that I wish to be married, if I am married at all, for myself. The heiress, Miss Brockton, will in a short time have practically ceased to exist and there will remain only Geraldine Brockton, though a moment before he had offered his hand and heart to Miss Brockton, the heiress!"

She was laughing now. Her eyes continued to flash upon him with that strange, lambent persistence. It was like a challenge. What could she mean? Again Severn seemed to turn dizzy. He kept his outward composure by a tremendous effort.

"If what you say is true, Miss Brockton, you will regret it, perhaps."

"Regret giving nearly all my fortune to charitable institutions? Ah, you judge as the world judges, do you? I had thought differently of you, Mr. Severn. Why should I wish to be so rich?" she cried with a sort of fierceness. Other women may be able to stand the test. I could not. It was making me hard, suspicious. It was making me doubt the whole world. It was stifling me. I shall have enough left for the decencies and comforts of life. And I am free! Yes I am free now. Before I was a slave—a slave to flatterers, to fortune hunters, to every form of human hypocrisy. Other people may feel themselves exalted by such a position. I felt myself degraded!"

She stopped. She almost seemed to pant. The blood rushed to Severn's brain. He took a step forward. What was he about to do—what to say? Whatever it might have been the portier was drawn aside and Mrs. Gwynne came in. The words remained unuttered on his lips.

But Miss Brockton spoke. A strange spirit seemed to possess her, urging her on, goading her to abrupt disclosures. Ah, Aunt Martha! I wonder if you'll be surprised, too, at my news? I have made an announcement which has stricken two men dumb with astonishment already. And yet it does not seem so strange, does it? Mr. Severn seems scarcely to believe that I have given away nearly all my fortune."

"What nonsense!" said Mrs. Gwynne.

Severn had vanished.

"You do say such extraordinary things at times," declared Mrs. Gwynne. "People will really believe at length, that you are not quite right, Geraldine."

"Aunt Martha!" Geraldine stood upright before her. "You don't believe me, either? It is true—true—! That was why I went to town to see the lawyer and—"

Mrs. Gwynne had fallen into a chair,

"What! Then all I have to say, Geraldine, is that you are insane! "Who ever heard of a girl giving away her fortune before?"

"Perhaps not, but—"

"You will regret this!"

Geraldine gave a strange, slightly bitter smile.

"I hope not."

"Jerry! Jerry!"

It was her younger brother's voice and it startled her from a fitful sleep. She startled up confusedly. The boy called again. His room was just across the hall. An acrid odor of smoke touched her nostrils. Throwing on her wrapper and weak-kneed with fear, she threw herself against the door. The hall was dark. She opened the door of the boy's room—a dense cloud rose toward her and smote her in the face.

"Eddy! Eddy!" cried the girl and threw herself into the room. She could see nothing. She was blinded—she could not breathe. She stumbled over a prostrate body.

"Eddy!" she stammered again.

Then she felt herself wrenched away by a strong arm, and someone had seized the boy's inanimate form and dragged it out of the room and her with it.

The next clear thing of which she was conscious was a tongue of flame running up her pretty dressing-gown and of being suddenly enveloped in Arthur Severn's coat, while this covering and his hands and arms stifled the just-born blaze. They stood in the hall and the cloak—and the arms—were still around her, and she was trembling in their clasp. Lights flashed out at the other end of the hall, and people came rushing along it, and Mrs. Gwynne appeared, white and breathless.

"Merciful heaven!"

It was only a little fire, after all, started from the boy's bed curtain having taken the blaze of a candle which he had left near it as he dropped asleep. It was not long before the lad had been restored to consciousness, the tattered curtain torn down, the charred bedding removed.

But Mrs. Gwynne did not regain her color. What was that she had seen? Should she never forget it?" Geraldine Arthur Severn! Why he had held her in his arms! He had held her in his arms and she had not seemed to struggle—she had not seemed to move!

All the next day Mrs. Gwynne went about in a sort of a dream. Finally, entering the drawing-room at twilight, as she had done the day before, she staggered back. If there had been any doubt in the night there was do doubt now. Geraldine and Severn were there near the fire, very close together, and he was bending, bending down over the uplifted face.

"Aunt Martha!"

Arthur Severn started and stood upright. It is a man's misfortune never to look heroic thus caught in the act. But Geraldine only smiled a divine smile,

"Aunt Martha, Mr. Severn and I are to be married next month."

* * * * * * * *

An hour later Mrs. Gwynne said:

"And so this was the reason for your giving up your money?"

"Yes. My money kept him away from me. And—and I wanted, beside, to make sure that he loved me for myself. And he does! He does!"

Mrs. Gwynne looked at the radiant face for a long silent minute.

"You are certainly," she observed with slow deliberation, "the most eccentric girl I ever knew in my life!"

And Geraldine only laughed.—New York Mercury.

He Was Greatly Embarassed.

In traveling over the battle fields of Antietam, writes a New York World contributor, I met an aged negro who seemed to know the lay of the ground perfectly well, and after a time inquired: "Were you here when the fight took place?"

"Right yere, sah," he replied.

"Saw it all, then?"

"Why, didn't you witness the movements of the troops?"

"Well, sah, I was dun embarassed a heap dat day. I knowed Gineral Lee was dependin' on me not to whoop for the Yankees, an' dat Gineral McClellan was dependin' on me not to whoop agin' 'em, an' so I dun went down cellar an' sat on de head of a cider bar'l an' let 'em fit it out de best way dey could."

Hawks on the Railway.

An engine driver on a Scotch railway has noticed that hawks of the merlin or "stone falcon" species fly close behind the train, near the ground, partly hidden by the smoke. As the cars thunder along through the fields and meadows small birds fly up in clouds, and while they are bewildered and frightened the merlin dashes among them out of the smoke and easily secures its prey. Should it be unsuccessful it returns to the wake of the train and awaits the starting of another bevy. The engine driver affirms that the hawk has no difficulty in keeping up with the swiftest express train.—London Tit-Bits.

QUANTRELL, THE MYSTERY.

A Short Sketch by One Who Knew Considerable About Him.

The public never seemed to have a correct idea of Quantrell, says T. J. Younger, an Osceola (Mo.) correspondent of the St. Louis Republic.

He came to Missouri a mystery, lived a life of mystery, and died unknown even to his most intimate friends.

He had but little to say about his career, and what he did say could not be strictly relied upon.

The only thing that was positively known of him was that he was reared in Ohio, and went from that state to Kansas, and from there to Missouri. He came to this State with a deep-seated enmity toward Kansas and Kansas men.

After gathering together a band of chosen followers he proceeded to wage a terrific warfare on Kansas and all who took sides with them in the border trouble.

The secret of his success was in the fact that every man in his command was carefully selected and drilled in the use of the revolver, then given to understand that he must fight when ordered to do so, selecting his own method, saving himself as much as possible, and inflicting as much damage on the enemy as possible, retreating or advancing as circumstances demanded.

If he had a man unfitted for his work he was sent to the regular army, and in this way he selected until a full company of tried men were banded together.

He had no discipline, rarely ever gave a command, and when he did it was to the point. He watched the movements of the enemy, knew when to strike, laid his plans, and depended upon his men to execute them. When all was ready for a fight his only command was "Fight them, boys," when pellmell they would go at the enemy with such fury that few, if any, ever withstood their charges.

He was not a tactician or an educated soldier, but simply a good judge of human nature. He knew what to expect of each and every one of his men under any and all circumstances; also what the enemy would do under any given circumstance. His men had absolute confidence in him and he in them. Hence they went to the enemy as an earthquake to a roaring cyclone. Quantrell was not communicative even to his best friends, except when absolutely necessary. Many of his most daring undertakings were a profound secret to his command until they were in the swim, and then they only knew they had a duty to perform and leave the rest to Quantrell. There were few if any of his men knew where they were going when they made the Lawrence raid. They were called together, Quantrell turned his horse in the direction of Lawrence, and they followed. The result is well known. When he destroyed Blunt's command, near Baxter Springs, not a man of his knew what he was up to until they were head over heels in battle. After Price's raid he gathered up twenty-five of his old guard, started from Jackson county, Missouri, crossed the Osage river at Linn Creek, Mo., thence to Pocahontas, Ark., thence to the Mississippi river, crossing over into Tennessee, thence to Kentucky, passing himself as a federal officer, drawing supplies at the posts as they went until some of his men got drunk and shot some of his federal officers, thus letting the cat out of the wallet and his disguise, resulting in his death.

He was wounded at old man Wakefield's and taken to Louisville, where he died under the care of the sisters of charity, and was buried in the Catholic cemetery, and to this day no living man has any idea what took him into Kentucky or where he was going from there, or what he expected to accomplish. His men had followed him with blind confidence, knowing he was on some kind of a desperate mission, with willing hands to execute his orders. His death left his intention a mystery, and thus the greatest guerrilla chieftain of modern times flashed across the military skies. He came a mystery, originated the most destructive band ever known, and died leaving them mystified.

Finds of a Hotel Clerk.

"For a little while recently," said Walter Conner, cashier of the Hotel Cadillac, one evening. "I thought I was out just $20 in good money. A guest came to pay his bill and handed over a $20 gold piece. I took it without looking at it very closely, but when I came to balance up I received a severe shock. When I examined the $20 gold piece I found it was considerable different from the regulation piece authorized by Uncle Sam. In the place where the word 'Liberty' appears was 'Kellogg & Co., and on the reverse side where 'United States' ought to be was 'San Francisco, Cal.' I naturally concluded at first thought that the coin was nothing more than an advertising piece, but as it appeared so like unto gold I concluded to ask people better posted on money than I was. I went to a banker, of course, and from him I received the news that the coin was genuine, in fact that it was worth more than $20. The banker explained that the piece was one which Kellogg & Co., of San Fracisco, were authorized by the Government to coin about the year 1854. He said that there were very few in circulation at the present day, but that each of them contained more gold than any of the regular $20 gold peices. Any jeweller, he said, would pay more than its face value for it."—Detroit Tribune.

MR LEE. "Why, Addie, you needn't cry about it! I only said Mrs. Allen was a very well-informed woman, and I wished you would follow her example."

MRS. LEE. "Yes, and last week you said you wished I could manage to look as stylish as Mrs. Allen,—and she makes all her own clothes. But she has what I haven't."

MR. LEE. "What is that?"

MRS. LEE. "Well, she gets all of her information from the Magazine they take. I admit that she knows all that is going on, and is bright and entertaining in conversation; but I could do as well as she does if I had the same source of information. She lent me the last number of her Magazine lately, and I learned more in one hour's reading, about various social matters and the topics of the day, than I would pick up in a month by my occasional chats with friends. It certainly covers every topic of interest, from the news of the day down to the details of housekeeping; and everything is so beautifully illustrated, too. Every time Mamie goes over to the Allens' she comes back and teases me to get you to take Demorest's Family Magazine, as the stories are so good. Even the boys watch for it every month, as a place is found for them also in its pages; and Mr. Allen swears by it. It is really wonderful how it suits every member of the family!"

MR. LEE. "Well, perhaps I had better send for a Specimen Copy; for, if it is anything like what you say it is, it will amuse and instruct the whole of us."

MRS LEE. "I see that W. Jennings Demorest, the publisher, 15 East 14th Street, New York, is offering to send a Specimen Copy for 10 cents, so we can't lose anything, as each number contains a 'Pattern Order' entitling the holder to any Pattern she may choose, and in any size—which alone makes each copy worth 30 cents; and I just want a jacket pattern like Mrs. Allen's. The subscription price is only $2.00 a year; and I must say I can't see how they can publish so elegant a Magazine for so little money."

Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedia Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

RED LAKE FALLS

Will Whoop 'er up on Saturday, July 4th—A Day of Patriotic Splendor.

The Program Filled With Interesting Features—We Will Celebrate as

THE CANNONADE.

The citizens of Red Lake Falls have arranged for a gorgeous celebration on Saturday, and a generous sum has been prescribed to defray expenses of the day. The national salute will be fired at sunrise. At about 9 a. m. the procession, representing the business institutions of the city, will form and march through the principal streets. It is proposed to make this scene one of grotesque grandeur, and many ludicrous exhibits may be expected. The Clearwater Island formerly known as Riverside Park, will be the scene of festivities, and here the Star Spangled Banner will float in all its majesty. Upon arrival here, Rev. Fr. Arpin will deliver an oration, followed by P. G. Falardeau. Dinner will be served on the grounds by the ladies of St. Joseph's church, while the ladies of the Presbyterian church will provide ice cream and cake. The list of sports embraces racing of all kinds and if the tracks are good we may expect to see some good races. Instrumental music will include selections by the Red Lake Falls Brass Band and solos by John Cooper, the celebrated clarionettist. Vocal music, consisting entirely of standard national airs, by a strong selected chorus, will be rendered at frequent intervals at the grounds. Swings and hammocks will be there in profusion for the amusement of the little ones. The many romantic nooks and fairy bowers enshrined with the dense verdure of nature's green will be attractive to those who like to steal away from the busy throng. In the afternoon a match game of base ball will be played between the St. Hilaire team and our home nine. After dark the display of fire works will take place. The ball by the Red Lake Falls String Band in the evening will probably be one of the largest dances ever held in the city. The music of course will be good, and Prof. Cooper's clarionette will give pleasure to those in attendance. Prepare for a grand time on the Fourth of July at Red Lake Falls, Polk county, Minnesota.

How to Play Tiddlede-winks

The game is played with tiddledies, winks, a wink pot, dingusses, duflicities, etc. Any number can play. Each player takes a dingus. The winks are divided equally and likewise the duflicities. Then you take a wink and put it on the dingus, press a tiddledy on the wink and make it jump into the wink-pot if you can. If you do you are entitled to a duflicity, and for every wink you get into the ding-pot from the duwink you count a flictiddledy.—Exchange.

Mr. Martin Purcell who has owned the North Spring flouring mills for some time but a resident of East Grand Forks has been in town the past week during which time be has sold the mill to Messrs. Jacklin & Ohm who will put in a great many improvements and prepare for a lively business this fall. Mr. Jacklin is well known in this part of the state as a first class miller in every respect. Mr Ohm is also a practical miller having been interested recently in a large mill at Caledonia, N. D. and one near the White Earth reservation. We understand he has sold his interest in these mills and will devote his entire time to the business here. This firm is cordially welcomed to this town as they intend to buy a large quantity of wheat here this fall and create the one thing lacking, a wheat market.

Come to Red Lake Falls to spend a glorious Fourth. All other attempts shrink into insignificance when compared to the gorgeous program prepared for our Fourth.

INDEPENDENCE DAY.

Sound the hew-gag! Play the pattle-tong!
Let the jawbone jingle!
For this is the Fourth of July.

No crumbling dynasties shall hush our noise,
No stern policeman fright our bully boys.
This is the day to make the welkin shake,
As our forefathers made their tyrants quake.

Go to! Shall not all earthly things this day
Be clashed together loudly in such way,
Stupendous din—stentorophonic clangs
Shall prove that patriot hearts now beat in bangs?

Let orators by millions praise the day!
Reverberating thunder split the sky,
And lightnings blaze to lick the ocean dry!

Set fire to everything, and bang around
The whole created world to swell the sound.
Burn up the poles, like two great cracker strings,

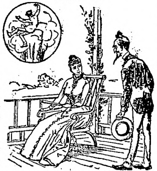
Anticipate the awful crack of doom
With all the mightiest cannons' cacophonous boom;
Then swell the noise with shouts; yell, split your throats;
Add even cornets and the base drum's note!

Sound the hew-gag! Play the pattle-tong!
Let the jawbone jingle!
For this is the Fourth of July.
Make a noise!

—David A. Curtis in New York World.

High Praise.



Agent—Well, madam, another glorious Fourth sees me here again. How did your husband like the keg of powder I sold him last year?

Lady of the House—He was completely carried away by it.

The Glorious Fourth.

The glorious Fourth will soon be here
With all its usual noise,
And many folk will miss an ear
From off their darling boys.

—Chicago Journal.

Hooray for the Day.

They fired the flying rockets off,
They fired the "wheel" and "crown,"
They fired the shooting crackers, too,
And then they fired the town.

—Floating.

The Janitor's Lament.

"Our job is not what it used to be," said a school janitor. "What's the trouble?" "Rubber boots, cheap rubber boots are the trouble. When they were a luxury boys had to be careful where they walked to keep out of the wet. That was when rubbers were for the few. Now every boy who can afford a hat has a pair of rubber boots, and slumps into every puddle and mudhole between his home and the school. It takes three times the sweeping of former days to keep the schools clean now."—Cleveland Press.

THE school children of New York have declared in favor of the "Golden Rod" as the national flower. It was expected that they would decide for the birch rod.

A BRIDEGROOM who skips out just before the time appointed for the wedding is usually deeply mourned by the bride and her friends, but it would seem as if she and they ought to be congratulated upon finding him out before it is too late.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN is recorded as once saying: "In general mankind, since the improvement in cookery, eat about twice as much as nature requires." What would the frugal Benjamin remark if he lived in these days of cooking schools?

ON the Atlantic coast the papers say that the weather has been hotter than ever before known in June. Spots on the sun are credited with some influence. Perhaps they have something to do with the genial and perfect June days of this lattitude also.

OSCAR WILDE recently startled society by dancing into a private reception attired in a long, brown coat, fantastically fashioned, a heliotrope necktie and yellow carnations in his necktie. He must have been a dream of delirium tremens beauty.

SUPPOSING the discipline of the penitentiary should be such that Herr Most should acquire the habit of washing himself? When he regained his liberty he would be in no condition to associate with his former companions, and his whole future life would be a dreary blank.

THE following is a scale of the average duration of animal life, from the most celebrated writers on natural history: A hare will live 10 years, a cat 10, a goat 8, an ass 30, a sheep 10, a dog from 14 to 20, an ox 20, swine 25, a pigeon 8, a turtle dove 25, a partridge 25, a raven 100, an eagle 100, a goose 150.

THE question of providing separate railroad cars for white and colored passengers is agitating certain people in Virginia. As a general rule, the folks who made the biggest fuss on this subject are of the sort that nobody, white or black wants for traveling companions on a railroad or anywhere else.

AND now they charge Whitelaw Reid with a violation of the contract labor law in employing two Austrian marble layers to assist in putting the finishing touches to his new mansion. It will probably cost Mr. Reid $2,000 in addition to their wages, but an editor doesn't consider cost when he goes in for a palatial home.

A NEW YORK youth named Robert Molloy was drugged and robbed of $168, and the action of the drug took away his hearing and his power of speech. If silence is golden young Molloy received more than a fair return for his cash, which was probably mainly silver. But he would no doubt willingly take back his speech and hearing and ask no questions that might bother his assailants.

THE announcement that Prof. Koch is still attempting to perfect his lymph, a pure cultivation of which he hopes to obtain in a few weeks, makes plain the "previousness" that has attended its introduction into the hospital practice of this country and Europe. It seems strange that so conservative a man as Prof. Koch is reported to be should have announced his discovery before he had carried his investigations to their legitimate results, as he is now reported to be doing.

IT is alleged that for a generation the people of Alexandria, Va., have been afflicted with a whistling distemper. It has often puzzled the good people of Alexandria to know why General Albert Pike changed his place of residence from this place to Washington a few years ago, says a Richmond correspondent. His residence at the corner of Cameron and St. Asaph streets was one of the nicest in this town. He had his magnificent library there, and when, a few years ago, he announced that he had determined to remove to Washington, many were the conjectures as to the cause of the move and many were the causes assigned. Only a few days before his death the matter was cleared up. In a conversation with a gentleman from this city the general was asked why he had left this city for Washington, and his reply was because "the Alexandria people whistle too much."

The residence of William Huggins, a farmer living eight miles south of Grand Forks, burned with its contents. Mrs. Huggins was badly burned, and died within an hour. She was the daughter of D. P. Reeves, a pioneer settler of the Red river valley. Coroner Rounseville has gone out to investigate.

Considerable alarm is being caused at Sanborn among the farmers by the appearance during the past few weeks of a new weed called pepper grass, which threatens to seriously injure, if not entirely destroy crops growing on summer fallow, which it alone appears to affect. It seems to choke out the grain, and it is said that many acres of wheat will not be worth cutting on account of its ravages.

The case of Braithwaite vs. Powers, appealed from Burleigh county as a judgment of the district court granting a new trial, was reversed by the supreme court. The case has been in the courts fifteen years, seventy five thousand is involved, and grew out of the Missouri river freight contract: Senator Powers, of Montana, and the Leighton estate of St. Paul, defendants. This decision is final and a victory for the plaintiff.

First Edition of Robinson Crusoe.

It is not every day that we have to chronicle the sale of a complete and perfect copy of the first edition of De Foe's immortal romance, "Robinson Crusoe." By a "complete" first edition is understood, of course, not only the "Adventures" themselves, which were first published in 1719, but the "Farther Adventures," which appeared a few months afterward, and also the "Serious Reflections During the Life of Robinson Crusoe," dated 1720. It is very unusual for the three volumes to appear in the market together, each of the premier impression, and we only remember of one instance during the last four seasons. In the Perkin's sale, July, 1899, a set was knocked down for £45. Recently Messrs. Sotheby sold a set, handsomely bound in morocco by Bedford, for the considerably enhanced figure of £55,—Pall Mall Gazette.

A gentleman, who modestly prevents our publishing his name and whose veracity is unquestioned, relates the following: "I had been picking cotton in my field very hard all the morning, and when dinner time came I lay down in the gin house, and must have dozed off to sleep, when all at once I felt a sharp prick on the end of my finger. I jumped and saw a large rat looking at me intently, and he kept running backward and forward but coming back at the same place each time. I picked up a nut and threw it so accurately that I killed the rat. About that time I discovered some cotton on fire, which I believe caused the strange actions of the rat, and I believe that I, as well as the gin-house, would have been burned had it not been for the timely bite of the rat."—Gordon [Ga] Press.

A Chinese Magistrate's Decision.

A remarkable decision is reported from Kluklang in China. A gambler forged a large number of notes for a thousand each on his brother's bank and put them into circulation. When these notes were presented at the bank the forgery was discovered and payment was refused; whereupon the enraged holders, storming the building, dragged the manager before the magistrate. The latter held that, since the writing and marks of the false notes were so like those of the regular bank notes that ordinary people could not distinguish between them, the bank would have to honor them, and he accordingly made out an order to this effect. As a result of this decision the bank has been forced to suspend payment, while the author of the mischief escapes punishment.

Big Funnels on Steamers.

Few people have any idea of the size of the funnels on the great ocean steamers. If you ask the first half-dozen people you meet for their estimate it is not likely that one of them will name a figure one-half the actual size. Most persons would say the diameter of funnels on the largest steamer is four to six feet and would want to wager that it was not more than eight feet. How far from the actual size such guesses are may be understood when it is stated that the funnel of the Etruria measures a little over eighteen feet in diameter. At even a short distance away this can hardly be believed. It gives an idea of the enormous size of the big steamers, We have grown so accustomed to them nowdays that we accept them as a matter of course.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Marriage in Japan.

"Your marriage laws are loose, but I don't think the question is of such grave import as the magazines make it out to be. Your people marry in too much of a hurry. They mix business principles with their love affairs. In Japan the principle underlying our marital relation is that the affection which makes marriage happy is not the love which precedes the union but the respect, esteem and sense of mutual helpfulness which arises afterward. But this way of trying to secure a good wife by first testing her sometimes fails. Some men marry thirty or forty girls in trying to get the right one. When a wife doesn't suit the husband he just sends her back to her mother with a kiss and his blessing. Then he marries another."—From an Interview with Prince Yanasi.

A PITCHED BATTLE.

Fatal Fight Between White Strikers and Negro Miners, Assisted by Pinkerton Men.

Two of the Strikers Killed and Several on Each Side Seriously Injured.

SEATTLE, Wash., Special Telegram, June 30.—Since the bringing of 600 colored miners from the East a few weeks ago to take the place of white strikers in the Franklin coal mines near Seattle, the labor unions have evidenced great dissatisfaction and late authetic news from Franklin, makes known that the negroes and Pinkerton guards had a pitched battle with the white strikers at daylight Sunday morning with the result that the whites were routed and driven back into the woods with a loss of two men killed, several others wounded and two women, wives of the white miners, were shot in the limbs but will recover. One negro was probably fatally shot.

It is estimated that at least 1,000 shots were exchanged, but owing to darkness most of the men fired at random.

The white strikers precipitated the battle by making the attack. After the fight, and when daylight came, the negroes were crazed with a desire for revenge, and threatened to go down on the flats, blow the mines and kill all the white miners, who number 125, and their families. The guards, assisted by Chief Sullivan, had all they could do to keep the negroes from carrying out

THEIR DIRE THREATS.

At 1 o'clock this morning two companies of militia were sent to the scene to protect the mine property and keep the negroes and whites from shedding more blood. One of the white miners named Robinson, who has been working with the negroes, shot and killed two of the strikers. This morning he was taken to Seattle by a detachment of rifles from Company B and was put in jail.

At the Gilman and New Castle coal mines mines, also in this county, the white strikers are causing much trouble. At the latter place the home guards, consisting of about fi ty miners, are drilling daily, not to uphold law and order, but to keep nonunion men from working in the mines. The Pinkerton guards are hourly expecting an attack.

The sheriff will leave for Gilman to-night and will endeavor to stop bloodshed, but this is hardly thought possible. The county officials and mine owners do not regret so much what has happened as they fear what will transpire within the next twenty-four hours.

USED GOVERNMENT MONEY.

PORT TOWNSEND, Wash., Special Telegram, June 30.—Nearly $100,000 of government money has been taken from the safe in the custom house here and used for private purposes by Collector of Customs Charles M. Bradshaw between March 1, 1890, and June 6, 1891. On the 6th instant there was a deficit of over $8,000 still due the government, and which Bradshaw had not replaced in the government safe.

Special Treasury Agent C. J. Mulkey has been employed in investigating and looking up the latest customs scandal. Charles B. Wood, late special deputy collector of customs, has submitted evidence and affidavits to Mulkey, corroborated by records in the custom house and certain banks, that prove beyond all reasonable doubt that Bradshaw allowed Morris B. Sachs, judge of the superior court, who was tried at Olympia last winter on impeachment proceedings, to take from the government safe at one time $1,396, with which Sachs purchased opium at the United States marshal's sale and which was afterwards sold at a profit of over $400. At several other times Bradshaw gave to Sachs, from the government safe, large amounts of money.

When the special agent examined the custom house accounts Bradshaw made affidavit that the amount which he was deficient was in transit from various subports on the sound. Last week Bradshaw sacrificed a valuable piece of business property for $8,000, with which he endeavored to square himself with the department by making the deficit good.

Every endeavor has been made to smother the investigation by Port Townsend Republican politicians and give Bradshaw an opportunity to resign.

BULLETS FOR A BRUTE.

A Tough Illinois Citizen Filled Full of Lead.

SPARLAND, Ill., June 30—About twelve years ago an esteemed citizen named John Carver died, leaving one daughter and three sons.

Subsequently his widow, whom he had left some $15,000, married a mere boy named Royal Frisby. Frisby at once developed into a first-class tough, and began spending the money in debauchery.

The citizens have for a long time been in arms against Frisby, and on Saturday a "white cap" circular was sent to him, and several sent to heads of families with an attached prayer "Help us for humanity's sake," and signed by the widow Carver and her three sons. The original circular detailed how, while yet the husband of Mrs. Carver, Frisby ruined her thirteen-year-old daughter, and how she bore him a natural child in the house of his wife, her mother. The father buried the child in the yard within sixty feet of the house. Mrs. Frisby was compelled by threats to witness the grossest of outrages by her husband until her daughter's shame and the shame of her household became public property. Then she secured a divorce, and immediately thereafter her husband compelled her daughter with a second natural child only two weeks to marry him.

Yesterday not having heeded the warning of the circular, he stepped out of his house and before he had gone twenty feet he was filled full of buckshot and instantly killed. The coroner's jury held Gip Culver, of Henry, Mrs. Laura Frisby and her son, John Carver, for the killing.

The killing meets with the approval of the community, and hundreds of citizens have offered to go on the bonds of the prisoners. It is said the first child born to the daughter was strangled by Frisby.

American Tin Manufacture.

LONDON, June 30.—The Times to-day, referring to the fact that sixty delegates from the tin plate working districts of Wales are going to the United States in order to inquire into the prospects of profitable employment there, says: "Should the delegates report favorably upon the prospects for tin plate workers in the United States it is not unlikely that there will be so large an exodus to America as to lead to a great portion of the trade hitherto monopolized by Wales being transferred to America, as there is nothing except the want of skilled labor to prevent the successful manufacture of tin plate in that country."

AT THE VATICAN.

The Pope Considering Objections to the Catholic Emigration Scheme.

ROME, June 30.—Under instructions from the Holy See an exact report of the comment made and the impressions produced in the United States by the project of Herr Cahensly regarding emigration to America has been drawn up and is now under consideration at the Vatican. The future action of the pope will largely depend on the impression created by the report, unfavorable or otherwise. The opposition of the American hierarchy to the scheme will not tend to smooth the path of Herr Cahensly or his colleagues, who, however, show no signs o discouragement and evidently intend to do their utmost to secure their ends.

The Catholic world here is endeavoring in order to mitigate the economic crisis, to promote a scheme in the European capitals' Catholic banks, which, working in connection with each other, would form a kind of international syndicate. In order to attain this end the argument of Boutouk is advanced, alleging the necessity of withdrawing the capital, resources and finances, of the Catholic world from what is practically an absolute Jewish control. This proposition was made once before, but fell through because it was not based on business principles. In spite of this, the present promoters have issued an appeal, in which they ask the co-operation of Catholic capitalists, and state that Catholic banks will be organized in London, Paris and Boston. It is affirmed that efforts will be made in New York to obtain support to the scheme.

The Holy See has been approached with a view to obtaining its support, but it has formally declared that it will have no connection with any combination of this kind. Cardinal Rampolli has formally made known this decision of the Holy See to the pontificate diplomatic corps.

BOTH WERE FOOLED.

A Laughable Incident Growing Out of a Diamond Robbery.

CHICAGO, June 30.—It was a case of diamond cut diamond to-night at the corner of Sangamon and Monroe streets.

Mrs. George Moergenthau, whose residence had been robbed of $700 worth of diamonds, was at the corner named to keep an appointment made by an anonymous letter received in answer to an advertisement from her offering $100 reward and no questions asked for the return of the jewels.

Several high police officials and well known newspaper men to whom the facts had been made known were also in the vicinity of the corner hiding and watching for the bold diamond robber to come out in the glare of the electric light and get himself captured in the most approved style.

When Mrs. Morgenthau nervously alighted from a car, dismissed the vehicle and presently gave the agreed upon signal sure enough a well dressed young man stepped briskly forward, handed her without a word the tiny package of supposed diamonds and received in return a bundle of supposed currency. Half a minute later the young man was under arrest. Then it was discovered that the packages exchanged by nervous Mrs. Morgenthau and the blithe young man contained neither greenbacks nor diamonds, but simply brown paper.

The prisoner, C. Burchard, who is following the races, declares he knows nothing of the missing diamonds, and was simply trying to capture the reward. He is intensely chagrined at the outcome, as indeed is also his very shrewd captors.

A SITE CHOSEN.

The Place for Sioux Falls' Public Building Duly Designated.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, June 30.—Secretary Foster to-day approved the recommendation of Special Agent McLean for the public building sites at Sioux Falls and Fargo. Thirteen sites were offered at Sioux Falls. The site approved is situated at the northwest corner of Phillips avenue and Twelfth street. The price is $8,000. Thomas H. Brown is the owner. Special Agent McLean looked over the thirteen sites offered at Fargo, and then decided to make a choice outside of any of these. The prices for the different locations ranged from $1 to $10,000. The site selected is situated on Robert street and First avenue, and the price to be paid is $4,000.

The report of the commission that visited Mankato, Minn., to settle the difficulty over the public building site in that city was examined by Secretary Foster this afternoon. He decided not to give his approval to-day. It need suprise no one in Mankato if the Holbrook property at Second and Jackson streets is selected. This lot will cost $5,000, and certain interested citizens will donate $4,125 of this amount, so that in case this site is selected the government will only be obliged to pay $875 for it. The commission examined eight sites offered in Mankato.

DYING OF HUNGER.

Russian Crops a Failure and People Are Starving to Death.

LONDON, June 30.—The Telegraph's St. Petersburg correspondent declares that the harvest in Russia this year is likely to be the worst on record.

Famine is already visible in the faces of the peasantry of Kostroma. Disease has already broken out. The only food is oat meal mixed with tree bark or similar ingredients.

In Kazon among indigents receiving meats gratis are 146 noblemen and 76 priests. In other districts similar conditions are reported. In the Jewish colony at Rovnopol many people are dying of hunger and hundreds have to huddle together. Several families live in one room often for the sake of warmth. Some papers contain advertisements of children of sale.

On Meredith's Trail.

WASHINGTON, June 30.—The fight of the Knights of Labor against Capt. Meredith, chief of the bureau of engraving and printing, has assumed increased interest in view of the fact that it has been taken up by the executive committee of that order. Messrs. Powderly, Devlin and Hayes have left Columbus, Ohio, to visit Washington in connection with the matter. The Knights, in a former interview with Secretary Foster, made the threat that they would use the power of that organization to defeat the election of Mr. McKinley for governor this fall if their demands for the reinstatement of certain Knights of Labor from the bureau of engraving and printing at Washinton were not complied with. It is with this object in view that the principal officers of the Knights of Labor are on their way here accompanied by two of Mr. McKinley's close friends.

The Dreibund Prolonged.

HAMBURG, June 30.—The emperor, conversing with Herr Nissen, chairman of the Hamburg-American Steamship company, announced that the dreibund was yesterday prolonged for six years. The emperor and empress landed in Heligoland this evening and were received by Commandant Geisler, Admiral Von der Goltz and other high officials.

ROME, June a.—Twenty-five radical deputies attended demonstration against the driebund in the Quirinal to-day. Signor Bovuo and others made speeches notable for their eulogistic references to France which were received with the greatest of enthusiasm.

SHEET-IRON PROTECTED

TRUE INWARDNESS OF THE TIN-PLATE DUTY.

It Was Put On to Help the Galvanized Iron Men—What Senator Aldrich Said—Roofing Iron and Tin Plate Prices Compared—Our Tin Plate Experiment Too Costly.

One of the main reasons why the McKinleyites put a high tariff on tin plate was to protect the American makers of galvanized iron for roofing purposes. Indeed, this purpose was boldly proclaimed by Senator Aldrich in his report on the Senate tariff bill in 1888. The Rhode Island Senator said in that report: "The free admission of iron and steel sheets of all thicknesses and widths coated with tin or lead, would cause a substitution of imported tin or terne plates in most cases for roofing and other building purposes, and for domestic uses, where galvanized or other sheet iron or steel is now used." The duty which Senator Aldrich was then defending by such frank humbug, amounted to 2.20 cents per pound, the duty which was finally put into effect in the McKinley law.

The purpose of the McKinleyites being to encourage the use of sheet iron for roofing instead of tin, which is better and cheaper, the higher duty and consequent higher price of tin has already begun to boom the sheet-iron business. It is announced in the trade papers that the Garry Iron and Steel Roofing Company of Cleveland, Ohio, has "an exceedingly fine trade for this time of the year." They are said to have "a large number orders ahead," and they are exporting their goods to Mexico, South America and other foreign countries. This latter fact makes it pertinent to ask why was it necessary to tax tin plates in order to help the roofing men when they able to export their products? If they were not able to hold the home market against foreign roofing tin, already taxed 1 cent a pound, or equal to 35 per cent. of its value, how can they export their roofing metal and sell it in foreign markets in competition with the same tin plates? Do they sell their products abroad at lower prices than to American consumers as other American manufacturers generally do?

The demand of the sheet iron men to be protected from tin plates has a flood of light thrown upon it by comparing the prices of their product with those of tin plates for the past five years. The average wholesale price of galvanized sheet iron of the thickness known as "No. 27 wire gauge" since 1886 has been 5.87 cents per pound; while the average import price of roofing tin, No. 28 wire gauge, for the same time has been only 3.19 cents. This is a difference of 2.68 cents a pound, while the McKinley duty on all kinds of tin plates is 2.20 cents a pound.

These figures suggest the very pertinent question, How are our manufacturers going to make tin plates and sell them at lower than present foreign prices, according to the confident boast of the protectionists, when our home-made galvanized iron itself has been selling at prices so far above foreign prices? From these figures, too, it is clear that Mr. Niedringhaus' partner in his St. Louis concern was about right when he saw that McKinley's duty of 2.20 cents was not high enough, and that a duty of at least 4 cents was needed to establish a domestic tin-plate industry.

American consumers have already paid at least $5,000,000 extra for their tin plates since last fall by reason of the rise in prices caused by the McKinley duty. This was the expensive result of the tin-plate duty during the six or eight months before it took effect. What will the consumers think of the added cost beginning with the application of the new duty itself on July 1? Are we not paying rather dearly to protect our roofing-iron industry?

They Dread the American Farmer.

McKinley tried to humbug the farmers by raising the duties on wheat, corn and most other farm products, under the pretense that such duties would help them to realize better prices. He belittled the farmers' foreign market and tried to make it appear that the best thing for our farmers would be to withdraw from their foreign market.

At least such is the only possible meaning of the following words, which McKinley put into his report accompanying the tariff bill:

"The 'world's market,' to which the advocates of tariff for revenue only invite the farmers of this country, is today crowded which the products of the cheapest human labor the earth affords. All over the old world there is a rush of their surplus to that market, and it is to such a contest as this that free trade would allure American agriculture."

But American agriculture is and has been for years "allured to such a contest as this," and even now the foreign demand for our agricultural products is causing prices to rise in the home market in a way to rejoice the American farmer's heart. This same American farmer is a dreaded force in all the farming districts of Europe. The following item has just been going the rounds of our agricultural papers:

"The Austrian grain growers, through the official report of the Vienna Agricultural Congress, declare and complain that 'the grain exporting capacity of Russia and extra European countries is the source of a calamity affecting the whole of Central Europe.'"

America is the only one among the "extra European countries" which cuts any great figure in Europe's grain market, and it is the American farmers to which the Austrian grain growers referred as their competitors.

Are not McKinley's duties on farm products the greatest humbug that anybody has ever attempted to palm off upon the farmer?

The Twine Trust Still Prospers.

When it was proposed last year to make a slight reduction in the binder-twine duty, the twine men signed a paper and sent it in hot haste to Washington, saying that if the proposed duty should be adopted they would be compelled to shut down their mills. Their alarm was still greater when fifteen Northwestern Republican Senators united with the Democrats and voted to put twine on the free list.

After a great amount of lobbying by the trust and certain Republican politicians, backed up by leading high-tariff journals with profuse and picturesque abuse of men who had voted for free twine, a part of the duty was saved. The old duty on manila twine was 2½ cents a pound, and on sisal twine 3½ cents. The trust succeeded in saving 7-10 of 1 cent from the wicked Democrats and Northwestern Republican Senators. This duty was less than one-third of the duty which the trust had said would close up its works.

Now, what is the result? The farmers are buying their twine this year at much lower prices than last year; and is the trust meanwhile shutting up its mills? On the contrary, it has just been announced by a high-tariff organ that the trust has bought the eight cordage works of Canada for $4,000,000.

Moral: When a tariff-protected industry threatens to die if you cut down its protection, it is very likely lying.

Three-Cornered Trading.

The West Indies and South America sell us from three to seven times as much goods as we sell them. These goods, over and above our exports to those countries, are paid for by European nations in their manufactured articles, and we square matters with Europe by shipping our farm products and manufactures there in payment of our debts in the West Indies and South America.

We swap debts, but in swapping there is always a certain per cent. lost in charges for bills of exchange, and through this cumbersome, three-angled transportation. Freights are lowest and trade consequently most profitable where there are ready cargoes for both ways. A regular steamship line is, in fact, dependent upon this regularity of cargo going and coming. As matters stand much of the traffic is done by the so-called tramp steamers, which go everywhere, according as they can get cargoes.

But why this three-cornered shipping? Why not the direct trade entirely? In answer to that question, the protective tariff must be called into the witness box. The tariff duty on raw materials prevents our manufacturers from competing in many kinds of goods in foreign markets, and there is no large demand for our farm products in West Indian and South American countries, they being themselves agricultural countries. Besides, the tariff prevents a large movement of European goods into our markets, and as Europe takes enormous quantities of our cotton, corn, wheat, flour, meats, etc., cargoes moving out are always much larger than those coming in. Hence European ships which take away our farm products are only too glad to carry cargoes of manufactured goods to the West Indies and South America, and then take in cargoes of sugar and rubber for New York.

Rose Insects.

A little aphis or green fly is the worst insect enemy of the rose, and the rose grower must be always alert to destroy this pest. Whale-oil soap in water, one pound to eight gallons, is very commonly used for the purpose. The liquid is best applied with a garden syringe. A very excellent mixture for this use is as follows: Take four ounces of quassia chips, boil ten minutes in a gallon of soft water; strain off the chips and add four ounces of soft soap, which should be dissolved in it as it cools, stirring it before using. In half an hour after using either of the above liquids the plants should be well syringed with clear water, which will wash the foliage clean.

The whale-oil soap solution is effective against the red spider, which sometimes infests rose-bushes, and also the black slug. One of the most annoying little insects is the rose-hopper, or thrips, yellowish white, very active, jumping from place to place. It goes in little swarms and works on the under side of the leaves and can do a great deal of damage in a little time. Syringing the under side of the leaves with water in which is mixed insect powder—pyrethrum—has the effect to lessen their ravages. Although the rose needs some attention, yet it will repay it with beautiful bloom, and what care it needs it must have. Many years' experience enables us to say that the rose, when its requirements are understood, is not a difficult plant to manage, and that many plants are given more care and make far less returns for it.—Vick's Magazine.

A Compensating Duty.

Have you ever heard of a "compensating duty?" A compensating duty is this: Woolen goods, for example, bear two duties, so much per cent. ad valorem and so much per pound additional. The reason given for this is that the ad valorem duty is protection against foreign goods of the same kind, and that the duty by the pound is to make good to the manufacturer the duty he had paid on raw wool. It is "compensation" to him for that outlay; the manufacturer himself regards it as such, and always insists on having the "compensating duty" maintained.

Now, if the foreigner pays the tax, why do the protectionists vote a "compensating duty" to the manufacturer? Ought they not in justice to vote it back to the foreigner if it is to "compensate" anybody at all?

It is clear that the McKinleyites themselves do not believe in their time worn assertion, "the foreigner pays the tax."

California Gets Cheaper Sugar.

For some time after the sugar tax was removed the people of California got no benefit from the removal, for the reason that Claus Spreckels, the great California sugar king, had made an arrangement with the sugar trust to keep up prices. More recently, however, refined sugar from Hong Kong and the Philippine Islands has been coming to the Pacific States in considerable quantities, this importation being possible under the half-cent duty on refined sugar; and this foreign sugar has compelled the domestic monopolists to reduce their prices.

The free importation of foreign goods would be the death of American trusts and monopolies. That is why all trusts are in favor of "protection to American industry."

IN New South Wales, the free-trade colony of Australia, farm laborers get an average of $225 a year with food and lodging, or nearly twice as much as was paid thirty years ago. In the United States our protectionists have the cheek to claim that protection makes wages higher even on the farm. Wages are doubtless higher with us than they were some years ago, but if farm wages doubled in New South Wales without protection, how can the increase here be due to protection?

IN the United States there are six acres of farming land and 9.8 acres of forest land per capita of the entire population; while in Great Britain each person represents only 1.38 acres of farming land and .07 of forest (i. e., seven acres of forest for each 100 persons). This difference in the density of population is persistenly ignored by protectionists, who can see no cause for higher wages with us except the tariff.

PROTECTIONISTS give themselves needless alarm when we buy more abroad than we tell there, and hence they advance a high tariff to keep our people from being ruined by what they call an "unfavorable balance of trade." But people do not need that the Government tell them when they are doing a losing business. Every separate article sold by us in Europe is bargained for by two intelligent merchants. Neither of these can ship a penny's worth without the consent of the other. The old saying holds true that it takes two to make a bargain; and it may be added that these two can make their bargain more satisfactorily between themselves than it can be made when some other power intermeddles.

A M'KINLEY TRUST.

THE WHIP MAKERS TO ENJOY M'KINLEYISM.

Organized for Tariff Spoils and Whips Are Higher than Ever—Closing Out Petty Rivals—A Monopoly of Materials—What Will Labor Get?—Tariffs and Trusts Akin.

Another McKinley trust has come to light. It is a whip trust. Last year the McKinleyites raised the duty on whips, and now the whip manufacturers have combined to take possession of what was so freely given them.

The whip makers do not understand what protection means if it does not mean higher prices; they know of no other way to realize what Maj. McKinley calls the "beneficiencies" of protection, than through higher prices. Hence it is announced that whips are already higher now than ever before, and one of the monopolists adds, "with a chance of a rise in price as the stock grows scarce."

This enterprising infant trust has provided, moreover, that stocks shall "run scarce." The trust got control of the rattan market and shut off the smaller whip concerns from their supply of this indispensable material. Without rattan whips cannot be made; and with the smaller whip factories closed up and their workmen out of employment, where does labor come for its portion of the blessings which were to follow McKinley's increased duties on whips? Labor simply gets left once more, and as usual a grasping monopoly pockets the tariff plums.

The whip trust is a McKinley trust. Under the old tariff whips covered with leather were taxed in a general "basket clause" at 30 per cent.; but this "basket clause" of the leather schedule was pushed up by McKinley to 35 per cent.

Most whips, however, are covered with flax, and here McKinley got in more of his "basket clause" work, by which whips of this kind were made dutiable at 50 per cent., in place of the old duty of 40 per cent.

The McKinleyites have no right to condemn the whip trust. This trust, like all the tariff trusts, is simply a means by which to harvest the tariff plums. The purpose of a protective tariff is to enable protected interests to charge higher prices for their goods, since this is the only possible way in which protection can protect. But a trust seeks to bring about precisely the same result.

The trusts themselves understand perfectly that they are working to accomplish, by combination, exactly the same thing that protection aims at by so-called legal methods.

President Havemeyer, of the sugar trust, blurted out this kinship between protection and trusts last year when certain high-tariff organs were assailing that great monopoly. Here are the frank and honest words of the sugar king:

"The great cry of one of the great parties is for protection; that is, they cry for it loudly during campaigns. But when we proceed to give ourselves some protection a howl is raised. They demand protection for the industries. When an industry protects itself it is said that it is illegal."

Remember.

The sun gives 600,000 times as much light as the full moon; seven billion times as much as the brightest star in the sky, and thirty-six million times as much as all the stars combined; in size the sun equals 1,300,000 earths, but owing to its smaller density its weight equals only 500,000 earths.

The organs of smell in the turkey vulture and carrion crow are so delicate that they can scent their food for a distance of forty miles.

The period of "a generation" has been lengthened; it used to be thirty years, and was later increased to thirty-four. Now a scientist says the average term of human life has increased in the last fifty years from thirty-four to forty-two years.

In the photograph of the heavens, in course of preparation in the Paris observatory, it is calculated that 64,000,000 of stars will be represented. In the nebulæ of the Lyre, M. Bailland took a photograph, four by five and a half inches, which revealed to the naked eye 4,800 stars.

Evidently Earns His Pay.

Lexington, Ga., has a town marshal well equipped for his duties. A few days ago, it is said, he had occasion to arrest three evildoers in a bunch. He gathered one under each arm, their legs dangling in the air, and drove the third along in front, and in that way proceeded to the calaboose, where all three prisoners were locked up.

PROTECTIONISTS are never weary of pointing to the English working classes as a proof of the bad effects of "British free trade" and of the superlative wisdom of the American system of protection. Let them answer this question: How does it happen that forty years ago, when England began her present policy, she had one pauper to every twenty-three of her population, and that now there is only one pauper to every forty-one? And how does it appear that in the same period, the ratio of paupers to the whole number of people in the United States has increased?

WOOLEN hosiery and underwear costing 30 cents a pound started out 100 years ago with a protective duty of 5 per cent. These goods have gradually climbed up the protective ladder till now, McKinley having put on a duty of over 200 per cent. When do stockings cease to need protection? Is this a decent way for our stockings to celebrate a century of protection?

FIVE students of the California State University, at Berkeley, caused a surprise to the professors, the other night, by hoisting a beer-barrel to the flag-staff.

CHINESE JOKES.

We are accustomed to think of the Chinese as solemn-looking people with slanting eyes and the corners of their mouths much drawn down. Nevertheless, they have a jest-book and its name is "Siao li Siao." Here are translations of some of the jests. The reader will be struck by the similarity of many of them to western jokes:

A confirmed drunkard in his dreams imagined that he had found a cup of excellent toddy and put it by the fire to warm in order to bring its flavor out the better. But the moment that he attempted to taste the delicious draught he awoke. "Fool that I was," he cried; "why could I not have drunk it cold!"

A certain man had his portrait painted; and when it was finished the painter requested him to inquire of the passers-by what they thought of it, in order that he might know how he had succeeded. The other agreed, and asked the first comer: "Do you think this picture like?" "The hat is extremely like," replied the would-be critic. He asked a similiar question of a second stranger, who answered that the clothes seemed to be exactly reproduced. He was about to interrogate a third, when the painter stopped him and said: "The resemblance of the hat and clothes is of no importance; ask the gentleman what he thinks of the face." The stranger hesitated a very long time; but at last, not being able to escape giving an answer, he replied: "The beard and hair are first-rate."

A rich man living between the forges of two blacksmiths, was continually annoyed by the noise of the hammers, and was in despair at being unable to rest either by day or by might. At first he tried to induce them to hammer more quietly; then he made them all kinds of promises if they would only change their abodes. The two blacksmiths at last fell in with his proposals, and he, transported with joy at the prospect of their departure, entertained them regardless of expense at a farewell banquet. At the end of the feast he asked them where they intended to set up their smithies. "Well," said one of them, "he who lived on your left will go to the smithy on your right, and he who lived on your right will go to that on your left."

A lady who had but lately been married, seeing her husband return after three days' absence, stole up secretly behind him and gave him a kiss. The husband was angry, and told her that she had offended against all his notions of propriety. "I am very sorry," she exclaimed; "I really didn't know it was you, my love!"

In a certain house there was a baby that annoyed every one by its continual squalling. At last a physician was called in. He administered a bolus of the soothing virtue of which he had a high opinion, and offered to pass the night in the house to observe the effects of the remedy. After a few hours, hearing no noise, he exclaimed: "Good! the child is cured." "Yes," replied the attendant, "the child has indeed stopped crying, but the mother has begun to mourn."

A certain man was condemned to the thief's collar, whereupon some of his relatives, seeing him, asked him how he had brought such a punishment upon himself. He replied: "As I was going along the road I chanced to see on the ground a little bit of rope. Thinking it might perhaps prove useful I picked it up and proceeded on my way. Such is the origin of my present trouble." "But," replied his relatives, "we can not believe that the theft of a piece of rope would bring you to this misery." Said the thief: "It is true that there was something at the end of the rope." They inquired what it was. "Only," answered he, "two little draught oxen." (It may be mentioned in passing that in 1872 a writer in the British Quarterly Review quoted this story as coming "from a Chinese source," though he did not allude to "Siao li Siao." It is possible that the heathen Chinee has more than one jest book. The date of "Siao li Siao" is unknown; but with regard to this particular tale the English have fairly early claim to it, as it occurs in the edition of Scogin's "Jestes" (1613), and possibly in also that of 1565, when the book was first licensed.)

A Fraud.

"Brethren, set down!" said the Rev. Mr. Harps, of Boomopolis charge, as the congregation rose en masse in the midst of the sermon.

"But, elder," whispered a deacon, hoarsely, "a boy has jest brought word that there's an Eastern capitalist in town lookin' over the corner lots with a view to purchasin' to-morrow, and—"

"Big fat man with pink whiskers and two watch chains?"

"The boy says that's him sure."

"Brethren, set down! I saw that man over at Prairie City yesterday. He hain't a capitalist; he's a corn doctor. Set down!"

A Wonderful Railroad Junction.

Clapham Junction, London, is probably the most remarkable and busiest railway junction point in the world. At this point the London and Southwestern and London, Brighton and South Coast Railways join and cross each other, and an average of 1,200 trains pass this place every twenty-four hours. Of this number 1,000 pass the junction between the hours of 7 a. m. and 10 p. m., which gives an average of one train every fifty-four seconds during the fifteen hours. The traffic is chiefly passenger trains.—Engineering News.

"JAKE'S" BANNER FOURTHS.

He is the Hon. Jacob now, a dignified and able senator, but back in the fifties he was simply Jake to all except his grandmother, the pastor who christened him, and the teacher when school was in. His first Fourth of July, according to the recollection of cotemporaries, was celebrated in a little New England settlement composed of farmers and miners. The old folks were slow, but not so the young ones, and in 1856, there being no general celebration on the docket, the boys of Oreville voted to have one of their own. Jake was in his eighth year, and though not formally on the committee, he was around during the councils, and by a timely word named the location for the "doings."

It was a rocky hilltop on his father's land, about 300 feet above level, the most sightly and convenient spot in the vicinity. Jake felt his responsibility, young as he was, and worked like a beaver to make the affair a success. The village figured in history as a place where Washington had had cannon made, and a cannonading outfit was early attended to. Three small pieces were borrowed from among the relics treasured in the neighborhood and dragged up the steep hill. A flagpole was raised, and bough booths for shelter and refreshments invited the populace to come and make merry. Everything was complete.

Stores of fireworks, of powder, of sugar and lemons, and cakes and candies were on hand, hidden in walled up caves, and the boys of Oreville sat up all night to welcome the inhabitants that would be summoned by a sunrise salute. The salute was on time, if not a little previous, but the morning hours dragged. Breakfast time came and went, and not a soul—aside from the faithful few who were doing it all, and the inevitable small boy hangers on—rallied to the hilltop to celebrate. The committee boys felt thin at the waist, and one by one went home to breakfast, promising to return on wings in order to do their assigned parts.

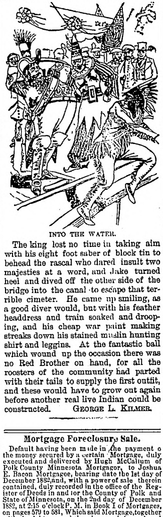
An hour passed, then another, and still another, and only now and then a spectator was half carried, half coaxed, to the hilltop. Jake made the trip from the store, the mines and the cottages to the hill dozens and scores of times, and finally from sheer exhaustion and disappointment gave it up. The cannon boomed at intervals up, down and across the valley; the flag flapped lazily on the pole; the lemonade grew stale and the candy almost melted in the burning sun. The ardor of the boys began to wane, and finally there was no one to serve the guns but Jake, whose enthusiasm was reduced to a simple regard for the reputation of his hill. In a fit of desperation and anger he scooped a handful of small stones from the ground and rammed them in on a charge of powder. The discharge was so much louder that he repeated the dose in other guns, until the whole valley got a bombardment of stones that shattered window panes and rattled on the roofs of the houses.

The boys laughed and cheered when they saw the people rush out of doors and stare at the display on the hilltop. A dozen pairs of hands fell to gathering stones, and after a few more volleys the inhabitants turned out en masse and climbed up the hill for safety. Then the boys resumed blank charges and the day closed with every soul in Oreville on Jake's hill.

Years passed before Jake got another chance to play a leading part in Fourth of July doings. The year following he had emigrated to another state, and spent the day wandering from crossroads to crossroads, and from postoffice to postoffice looking for the Fourth. The next year he put in hoeing corn. The year after that he held a flag for a Sunday school picnic, riding twenty miles standing up in a hay wagon loaded with fidgeting, perspiring humanity, and went home to reflect that he had endured the tortures of a twenty mile ride on lumber trucks, working like a yeoman meanwhile to keep old glory afloat, just to eat some of his mother's cake and his aunt's bread and his cousin's biscuit. The next year, however, made up for a string of eventless Fourths.

It was the occasion of the Prince of Wales' visit to America, and Jake had become a town boy in a wide awake place that got up a mock reception to a spurious highness, who made his entrance in state on a canal barge. The fantastic turnout was something gorgeous in its hideousness and in its universality. All America, including even Ah Sin and a group of his cousins, was represented in a procession that moved with floats and carriages, on foot and on horseback. Up to the last moment the aborigines were forgotten in the rage for showing foreign acquisitions. Jake was a patron of the literature of the border and an admirer of the red man, and his services were accepted without question to fill the gap in the procession. All went well, and the umber colored child of the forest received his share of homage from the crowds that reviewed the pageant.

Finally the canal bridge came in sight, with the prince standing on the edge of the barge receiving the welcome of the nations at the hands of a spokesman as each division came up. Jake saw just in time that he was a nation all in himself and must be his own spokesman, although no speech had been given him to rehearse. It occurred to him, too, that his speech must be in the Indian tongue, and he knew but one expression that he could trust himself on. Halting and saluting the prince and his train with many contortions intended to convey respect he bawled out, "Say-go-ye-wat-a-hah," to the amazement of the king of the fantastics, the mogul of the day, who stood beside the distinguished guest. It happened that the king was the champion fat man of the town—in fact, he was the shape of a sugar cask, the longest, the broad way. It also happened that Jake emphasized the last three syllables of his lingo, and in the hubbub of the occasion everybody within hearing, including the king and prince, understood him to say for a windup, "What a hog," his eye meanwhile being on the imposing and all overshadowing king.



INTO THE WATER.

The king lost no time in taking aim with his eight foot saber of block tin to behead the rascal who dared insult two majesties at a word, and Jake turned heel and dived off the other side of the bridge into the canal to escape that terrible cimeter. He came up smiling, as a good diver would, but with his feather headdress and train soaked and drooping, and his cheap war paint making streaks down his stained muslin hunting shirt and leggins. At the fantastic ball which wound up the occasion there was no Red Brother on hand, for all the roosters of the community had parted with their tails to supply the first outfit, and these would have to grow out again before another real live Indian could be constructed.

RED LAKE FALLS,

fb21may Polk Co., Minn.

Red Lake Falls.

THE PEOPLE OF THAT VILLAGE ARE ANXIOUS TO SECURE THE DULUTH & WINNIPEG.

From the Duluth Daily News.

The little settlement of Red Lake Falls, with its 1,200 or 1,500 people, situated on one of the best water powers in the state, and with an apparently inexhaustible supply of the finest pine now standing in America, with its adjoining rich farming and grazing lands, seems at last to be very near the fruition of the hope which has been a sort of day dream with it ever since the place was started —the hope of ultimate rail connection with the Lake Superior region.

The preliminary surveys of at least two lines of road—the Northern Pacific on a proposed northeasterly branch from Red Lake Falls to tap the pine region at the southwestern portion of Red Lake and thence in a continued northeasterly line to an ultimate destination of Rainy Lake river at the junction with the Lake of the Woods is one route which has been carefully bolted down on engineers' note books and profiled for the benefit of the directorate of the Northern Pacific road.

But there is another route which will prove of the greatest benefit to the people of Red Lake Falls and which they should lose no opportunity to secure—and that is the extention of the Duluth& Winnipeg railway. The preliminary surveys have been made, but nothing definite has been determined upon as to the exact and final location of the line. The preliminary survey runs near to the little settlement of St. Hilare, but a judicious inducement in the shape of voluntary aid to the proposed extension would beyond doubt secure its permanent location through Red Lake Falls, placing that village on the direct line to the head of Lake Superior and giving it the prestige which attaches to the location of division headquarters, the site for railroad shops, and the usual influx of manufacturing industries flour mills, and saw mills, etc., which its water power would prove powerful inducement for. The party of Duluth and Winnipeg surveyors which will again pass through that region will probably fix the permenant location of the new line and the action of the people of Red Lake Falls, which is understood to be strongly in favor of bonding that section to induce the company to build direct to that town, will undoubtedly give them the prize they wish so much to obtain.

Postmaster General Wanamaker's straw men may prove to be the straws at which he will grasp in the political swim of '92.

Every democratic stump orator is already pointing the finger of scorn at the present administration and shouting to the world that there isn't surplus enough in the treasury to buy a calico apron for baby McKee.

Polk County is receiving considerable advertising in connection with the building of the Duluth and Winnipeg railroad. Not half enough has been said about our resources and our opportunities to furnish homes for thousands.

With a portion of the republicans of the state forming a law tariff branch: the democratic legislators organizing to run the party and boom each other for office, with the fish Donnelly versus Owen factions only in the alliance party—from such turmoil we can seek consolation by reflecting upon the glorious past when the rock ribbed bloody shirt republicans the true Copper head and the great world reforming alliance man of a year ago, held sway.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

J. D. Marshall returned yesterday.

John Nelson was at Grand Forks Saturday.

A. D. Wishard went to Euclid Tuesday morning.

Mrs. Flack's father, from Texas, is visiting her.

Mrs. J. F. Krost and children and Miss Gertie Kauter arrived Saturday.

Miss Louise Gesswine returned to Minneapolis Saturday night.

All those who were fortunate enough to have heating stoves up utilized them Monday.

Mrs. J. P. Harren and children returned from Spokane Falls, Wash., this morning.

Mrs. A. Wishard is in very poor health. It is the hope of all that she will speedily improve.

Come to Red Lake Falls to celebrate the Fourth of July. You will surely miss it if you do not.

H. O. Jerberg is doing great work on the Commercial hotel premses. He will have it fixed up in good shape.

Robbillard & Co. have opened their saloon in the Kaufer building. They will have an elegant bar room.

Bids for building the new schoolhouse will be opened Saturday and work rushed. Property will be bought whose title is cloudless.

A. D. Wishard made two sales of land this week of Polk county farms—one for $1,280 and one for $1,200—both unimproved farms.

Mr. and Mrs. Yaton, of Wadena, friends of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Lowe, spent a few days last and this week visiting at the latters' residence.

The pastoffice is now located in the corner room of the Ralph block—right hand neighbor of the NEWS a fine location, and we congratulate Postmaster Hunt upon his seund judgment.

Rev. Fr. Feige of Terrebonne showed good judgment when he secured Nick Helm to decorate the interior of his residence. The job is a splendid one—a gratification both to Fr. Feige and Mr. Helm.

The actions of the democratic legislatures in calling their trusted friends to let into the secret smacks very strongly of a robber game wherein the pelf is to be devided in a sort of coopertive way.

Mr. Langlois, who has grown familiar to the citizens along the Lambert mail route, has resigned his position, and Mr. Lecourse will hereafter do the work. Mr. Langlois has become like a landmark and will be greatly missed.

Cyprian Gosselin is in the city figuring on the foundation for the new school house. Mr. Gosselin says the postoffice at Emardvile will be located in his store room hereafter, making it more central and convenient for its patrons.

The Red Lake Falls String Band is an institution that deserves as much encouragement as any other band. Mr. Cooper will play several grand solos on his clarionette at the dance Saturday night. The music for the dance will be withou doubt fine.

John Nelson, the jolly teamster of the Ralph & Bourden dray line, is an ardent admirer of the fair sex. The assortment of fancy pictures of different female celebrities John has accummulated goes to show his taste is not degenerated and his faculties for distinguishing still acute.

During the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Z. Poulliet circus day a number of bad boys of town broke into their house about a mile east of the village and destroyed property to the amount of fifty dollars. The young fellows were full of mischief and procuring a jar of lard from the cellar daubbed the house from garret to foundation. Not content with this they opened trunks and poured the lard among the clothing. There are a number of boys in the village who, if they continue with their ruffianly work, will make good subjects for the reform school.

I have seen the dusky maiden from the Red Lake reservation, and the Vi-king's big foot daughter from the town St. Hilaire. I have watched with contemplation and a sort of consternation at the speck-faced girl from Crookston who'd drive a lion to his lair. There's the languid red nosed darling from the river of the Thieves and the Fosston girl appalling with a smile as softly falling as the golden autumn leaves. The Fertile girl ablushing and East grand Forks so gushing and Fisher with her W. C. T. U. I have gazupon the features of the most bewitching creatures; you will see them in their glory when angel Gabrial calls. I say it with precision—I have never seen a vision so entrancing or elysian as the girl of Red Lake Falls.

Capital Gossip.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 30th, 1891.—Rumors are rife again that Mrs. John A. Logan is soon to marrp George E. Lemon, the millionaire pension claim attorney. When Mrs. Logan sailed for Europe several weeks ago she is said to have given a hint of her purpose to a few friends. And now Lemon himself has gone to Europe, and before sailing made no secret of his intention to join Mrs. Logan's party and travel about the continent with them. The names of Mrs. Logan and Captain Lemon were linked for matrimony some months ago, and idle tongues can only see a marriage abroad in their presence across the Atlantic this summer. At the time of the report both entered a strong denial, but now there are a great many who believe the report to be true.

The entire attention of the whole scientific world is centered on the capitol of America. There are to be held four noted scientific or popular conventions during August; among which is the meeting of the American Academy for advancement of science, the International Geological Congress and the convention of the Geological Society of America. These conventions not being of a political character are calculated to bring a high class of people to Washington and and to spread its flame over the entire civilized world.

Within a year from July 1st the treasury department will pay to citizens of the United States between $12,000,000 and $15,000,000 as a bounty for raising sugar. This sum will be disbursed in various parts of the country. The most of it will go to Louisiana for the production of cane sugar. Over $1,000,000 will be paid to the farmers in New England States, New York, Ohio, Illinois and the Northwestern states for the production of sugar from maple sap. A large sum will be distributed in Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa and California among those who make sugar from beets and sorghum cane. The distribution of such a great sum of money among so many people, so widely separated, and the pains that must be taken to prevent fraud upon the Government, will be an under tasking of of considerable magnitude. Every eunce of the millions of pounds of sugar produced, must be weighed and samples of it tested and inspected by a Government Inspector, who will be appointed for that purpose. This work will be done unnder the directon of the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department, and and will be conducted with suce thoroughness and system as to prevent and to detect fraud. Secretary Foster is expected to name the ten or a dozen sugar inspectors who are to supervise this work in a few days. There has been a great deal of friction among the politibians over these places, which will be worth probably $1,800 a year besides actual traveling expenses. Several states which do not produce sugar of any kind have demanded one or more of the inspectorships, and and two or three of the sugar producing states think they ought to have them all, notably Louisiana and Nebraska. Mr. Mason, Comissioner of Internal Revenue, said to-day that he would not indicate who were to get these positions; but said that Ohio men would get two of them, by vertue of the fact that it was, a maple sugar, producing state and was the home of McKinle, the author of the present tariff law and of Senator Sherman, one of the leading protectionists of the country. He said the Presidents State, Indiana, would have to be given one, because it produced a great deal of sugar, and that Kansas, Nebraska, and California, each a sugar producing state would get three more. Louisiana, he said, had demanded the appointment of all the others, basing its claim for the places upon the fact that it produced more sugar than all the others basing its claim all toe other s tates combined.

Swimming.

Every man or woman onght know how to swim. The best way to teach swimming is to put a harness or belt about the body of the pupil under the arms, attach to it a strap sufficiently long to be just taut at the level of the water and have a little pulley at the end of the strap running free upon a wire stretched above the tank. This gives the pupil the necessary confidence that he isn't going to drown, and yet if the proper tension is provided, it doesn't prevent him from working. It's better to have the loop and a portion of the strap or rubber to allow for stretching. The pulley follows him back and forth about the tank. But it isn't everybody who has a tank. How would you work it out doors? Attach a similar loop to a short, stout pole, and go out in a float or heavy boat and encourage the pupil to swim round and round it, gradually easing away the tension upon the loop as he became proficient or tightening it as he floundered—just like playing a big fish. Or, if I lived near a river, and the banks were sufficiently steep, I could walk along by the side of the water, while the pupil, in his harness, swam. As soon as possible, I would dispense with the harness altogether, and go into the water with the child. The old fashioned method of throwing the pleading, crying urchin at once into deep water is not good. To begin with, there is some danger of drowning. Even if no such result terminates the experiment, the pupil is apt to get such a terror of deep water that he will never willingly go near it again. Of course, though, some boys would learn to swim that way and many have. But I wouldn't let a child of mine be so treated. The swimming loop referred to is in use in most of the New York gymnasium, but the outdoor modifications of it are capable of a more extended usefulness. It isn't every athletic club which can afford a great swimming tank like those of New York and Manhatten clubs, with shallow water at one end for dipping and deep water, at the other for plunging. But there's plenty of deep and shallow water out of doors. Water polo, a novelty of a few months in the tank of the big athletic clubs will be taken out of doors this summer and played in the proper swimming waters. No equipment is required except a ball that will float. With it any party of youngsters by chossing sides, can make as much fun for themselves and the spectators as cracks in a costly building. Considered purely as an exercise swimming is highly praised by experts. It gives a varied exercise, calling into play many muscles not ordinarily used, but its effect upon the lungs and muscles ot the rear of the neck which most commends it. The exertion of breathing while immersed in the heavy fluid is excellent for reasonably healthy lungs, affecting them like mountain climbing, while the necessity of holding the head well up induces an erect carriage. Wry-necked expert swimmers are seldom seen. They are, as a rule, splendid, deep-chested fellows. A woman who swims much is apt to to have a figure which causes envy in others of her sex. The old paddle stroke sometimes used in swimming—the boys call it "dog fashion"—is never employed by fast swimmers, except possibly for a few strokes to rest some tired muscle. The square breast stroke, which is what most people first learn, is not a very fast one, either, though for long distances is the easiest. Most of the tide water racers use the English stroke, in which one side of the body, usually the right, alternating with the left for shorter periods, is kept well in advance, one arm ever reaching out toward the goal, the other underneath never showing above the water. The body seems to meet with less resistance when it thus cuts the water edgewise, as it were. When a swimmer has mastered this stroke and can dive forward, backward or sideways, he is ready for water polo, swimming races, diving for small stone, or for saving lives if he is strong enough.—Dr. Savage.

Council Proceedings.

Special meeting June 8, 1891.

All members present.

On motion Christ Anderson was allowed the sum of $750 on account of having fulfilled the well contract with the village and an order on the general fund was drawn for that amount.

On motion the recorder was instructed to advertise for bids for continuing the sinking of the artesian well below three-hundred feet according to instructions of street committee.

On motion council adjourned.

THE SURF AT LONE HILL.

[Copyright, 1891. All rights reserved.]

IT HAD been decided by the young people of "our set," as they referred to themselves, to include in their celebration of the Fourth an excursion to Lone Hill. Not everybody may know what the attractions of Lone Hill are, or where it is, for it is but an insignificant mound of sand a few miles to the east of Fire Island lighthouse, on the southern shore of Long Island. Beyond the smooth white beach, that is unbroken, save for inlets, for one hundred miles or more, there is little about the place to make it attractive. The idea originated with the Sawyers, or rather with young Jim Sawyer.

"It's stupid," he said, "lying around here and letting the sloop to city visitors on holidays. We're doing well enough. Let's make a holiday of the Fourth for ourselves, 'stead of working harder then than any other day."

Ably seconded by his elder sister, Nellie, Jim carried the day in his own household, and after that the "set" joined in. Henry Martin, true enough, had held back somewhat in favor of making business of the Fourth and a holiday of some other occasion, but he was overruled indignantly, and Nellie Sawyer even said one or two sharp little things about some people's small dispositions, so that Henry retreated hastily. Nellie's words might have kept him away but for two reasons: Young Jim was a firm friend and admirer of Martin, and he threatened to make it uncomfortable for Nellie if Martin was "frozen out." Martin knew that the lad's tongue would fulfill the threat, to the mortification of not only Nellie but himself as well, and therefore he ignored his wounded pride and joined with apparent heartiness in the proceedings.

Young Jim would have made up the party in the exclusive interest of his hero if he could have done that, but Nellie had her own will, too, and in this case she compelled her brother to yield to the dictates of the senior Sawyers, neither of whom understood the cause of hostilities between their children.

So when the excursionists started from the Babylon wharf at 9 o'clock on the morning of July 4, 1884, there was a rankling discontent in the heart of more than one member of the party. Three boats made up the fleet. The Sawyers' large and handsome sloop carried about twenty, among whom were all the elderly people, Nellie and Jim, and two of the young men whom Henry Martin knew to be his rivals. Henry was consigned to one of the minor boats. Although this arrangement was due to Nellie's strategy, there was a spice of dissatisfaction in her view of the situation. Just what it was, or why, is more than I can say, for the vagaries of a young woman's heart defy my comprehension and analysis. I never did understand them and I never expect to; I simply put down what I know, and among those things is the fact that Henry Martin was Nellie's favorite, and that not all of young Jim's ill advised efforts in his behalf could displace him from a high place in her affections. In fact, had it not been for Jim, Henry might have sailed in the big sloop; but it doesn't matter much, for no blunder of that well meaning boy could have affected seriously what finally came to pass on that Fourth of July, seven years ago. Just before the boats put off Jim had whispered to his hero:

"Never mind, Mart; I'll keep those duffers at bay till we get to Lone Hill, and then you watch your chance," to which Henry's reply had been a silent scowl; but he made up his mind, nevertheless, that the day should not pass before he had come to an exact understanding with Nellie; for hitherto there had been no declaration or other formal talk between them.

Arrived at Lone Hill the party went directly across the narrow sandy strip of land that prevents Great South bay from being a part of the ocean. There was a grand surf rolling away out on the beach, which at the time of the arrival of the excursionists was as wide as possible, for it was low tide. The wind freshened steadily and veered about until it came from the southeast, and the weatherwise talked of fogs and storms. Nothing interfered with the pleasure of the day, however, and preparations were begun for an outdoor dinner, provisions from home being increased by various articles secured on the spot.

Henry Martin joined earnestly in the work, and sought especially to be of assistance to or under the direction of Nellie; but Miss Nellie, with that rare tact for giving stabs with a smile and a laugh that only maidens possess, refused his services while gladly accepting those of his rivals. It proved to be of little use for him to try to assist, but he stood about with an appearance of good nature, and when dinner was finally eaten he played his part in the entertainment. There were speeches in which the American eagle fairly howled defiance and flapped her wings scornfully at Britishers; and there were explosions of crackers and firearms by Jim and his immediate companions that made their quiet loving elders wish they had staid at home. Then the party broke into little groups, and after a time, through his customary quiet persistence, Henry found an opportunity to speak to Nellie. The rising tide had hidden more than half the beach, and the still rising wind had set the breakers roaring. They stood where each incoming wave caused them to retire a little farther inland.

"I've been waiting all day for a word with you, Nellie," said Henry.

"Isn't that a grand roller?" she inquired, pointing indifferently to a wave combing and foaming as far as the eye could reach along the sands. Henry glanced at it seriously and was silent for a moment. Then he resumed:

"Nellie, you are not interested in the rollers. I know that, and you are trying to put me off. You've been trying to tease me all day"——

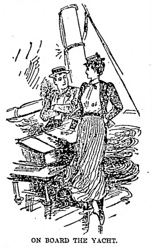
"Yes, I have," continued Henry with a smile, "but I admit that you have a right to tease me if you want to. Still, you wouldn't do so, I think, if you realized how much I care for you. You know I love you, Nellie; there's no need for me to tell you that, but you cannot know how much I love you, and perhaps the worst of it is that I can't tell you. Just let's understand each other, Nellie, if it's no more than for this minute. I thought you loved me. You do, don't you? Don't you, Nellie, dear?"

Now I happen to know that Nellie at this moment was proud of Henry's love; she loved him herself as best she could in her own way; she was happy and triumphant at once; yet, for reasons past my ken, she made this reply:

"If you stand there another minute you'll get your feet wet."



ON BOARD THE YACHT.

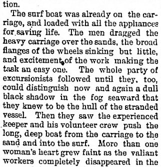
So astonished, nay, shocked, was Henry at such an answer that he jumped from his tracks as if a wave were about to ingulf him, whereat Nellie laughed. Then Henry flushed with something akin to anger.

"And that is all?" he asked; and after a slight pause, "I think we understand each other," he added, and walked rapidly away.

To everybody but Henry and Nellie the afternoon passed happily. The tide had nearly reached its height when all noticed that the horizon seaward was nearer at hand than it had been. As they watched they saw the sky slowly but surely eat up the rolling waters, and presently across the pounding breakers a dense and gloomy fog stalked in upon the beach, and in another moment, wind driven, it had wrapped itself about Lone Hill, blotted out the Point of Woods and hidden in blank grayness all the land beyond the bay. But it made little difference to the party of excursionists; there might be necessity of waiting before venturing across the bay, but that would merely prolong the enjoyment, and so the fun went on.

It was some time between 4 and 5 o'clock, and fog and wind and tide were at their height, when a man came trudging through the gray obscurity with a message that turned the thoughts of all the party from amusement or patriotic celebration. His message and the deeds it led to are well remembered along that part of Long Island, and they have taken their place in the history of the United States. The man was Keeper Baker, of the government life saving station situated at Lone Hill, and he brought word that a big vessel had stranded about half a mile east of the station. When the southeast wind gathered up the dense fog of July 4, 1884, Baker began to patrol the stretch of beach guarded by his station, and so it was that shortly after she drove in upon the sands he was able to distinguish dimly the outlines of a great boat beyond the surf, and he knew at once that all on board were in imminent peril. He did not say all this to the party of excursionists; one glance at his strong face told them that he sought a volunteer crew. He had hardly begun his hurried explanation before Henry Martin had placed himself at the keeper's side. It was but a moment, and then the keeper, followed by six stalwart men, hurried to the station.

The surf boat was already on the carriage, and loaded with all the appliances for saving life. The men dragged the heavy carriage over the sands, the broad flanges of the wheels sinking but little, and excitement of the work making the task an easy one. The whole party of excursionists followed until they, too, could distinguish now and again a dull black shadow in the fog seaward that they knew to be the hull of the stranded vessel. Then they saw the experienced keeper and his volunteer crew push the long, deep boat from the carriage to the sand and into the surf. More than one woman's heart grew faint as the valiant workers completely disappeared in the spray of the first roller that struck them. Then with a great glow of relief they saw the boat upright upon the tumbling water, four men pulling at the oars, and the keeper directing her head straight against the oncoming waves, and after that they watched with straining eyes and bated breath the surf boat slowly make its way toward the vessel, until the fog shut it wholly out of vision.



The men pulled away, and at last by the exercise of skill that accomplishes marvelous deeds with small boats in a high sea, they lay alongside the stranded vessel, which proved to be the Gulf of St. Vincent, an iron steamer, of Hartlepool, England. She was just at the end of a voyage from Calcutta to New York. She was well laden with merchandise, and besides a crew of thirty-two men she carried five Hindoo passengers. The latter naturally received the first attention of the life savers, and the more especially because the captain of the steamship believed that his vessel could be worked off the sands before another morning, and he therefore chose to remain on board with the crew.

After what seemed an age to the excursionists on shore, the surf boat was seen returning. The men gathered at the water's edge and in it to assist in effecting a landing, and the women crowded down behind them. The boat had been successfully beached, and four of the passengers had been lifted out, when a great roller dashed some of the men down and began to swing the boat around. The fifth passenger, a woman, fell forward in her fright. One of the crew dashed into the receding water, seized her and struggled with her in his arms to the shore. Few noted the deed in the general activity and excitement, but Nellie saw it, for the man with the living burden was Henry Martin. Not stopping at the beach, he plunged off through the fog and across the sands toward the station, a half mile away.

"Henry!" called Nellie, as he struggled along, but his form was already dim in the fog, and if he heard her he did not reply. She would have followed but that like others she was called upon to help care for the rescued people, all of whom were conveyed as speedily as possible to the station. When Nellie reached the station the woman saved by Henry Martin was there, but Henry had gone back to the surf boat. How he contrived to carry his burden so far may best be explained by the heroes of the life saving service, who know not till the strain is over that they have been enduring and accomplishing miracles.

It was then dark, and the volunteers built a great fire and lay down upon the sand beside it to await a signal from the steamship should she begin to go to pieces. No signal came, but how the men by the fire waited all night, and went out next morning through the heavy surf to the ship again; how men came from Blue Point and Point of Woods stations; how life buoys were rigged; how the captain refused to abandon his ship; how other crews put out in boats across the surf, and all were driven back; how the captain had to yield to the inevitable, and, after three days of almost constant work, how he and all his crew were saved—these things and much more are all set down in official records of the government. For me it only remains to tell of a young man, haggard, unkempt and weary, who left the station at last with something almost of regret in his heart that the sea had not swallowed him, and yet something also of manly pride in the struggle he had endured: who crossed the sand bar and went toward the bay, where his companions had told him a boat was waiting to take him back to Babylon. This young man plodded along heavily, wholly unlike the giant who had battled with wind and waves, and sands and fog, and he did not look up until startled by a woman's voice close by. It was Nellie, for when she had seen him coming she had ran from the Sawyer's sloop to meet him. And when they both had gone aboard, Nellie blushing and excited, and Henry dazed, but strangely happy, young Jim shoved off from the dock, and taking the tiller said:

"I'm all the crew there is, Mart, and I guess in this breeze I can get you home O. K. If I can't I'll tell you to help me out. You and Nell sit down and say what you please. I sha'n't see anything but the wind and the peak of the mains'l."

"ELIZA."

A STRANGE STORY.

WHAT was I to do? Never was a woman placed in such a pitiable condition. I had been brought to Russia by an English sewing machine company to run their machines at an agency of theirs in ——street, in St. Petersburg, where a handsome shop had been taken.

One blustering, cold day, toward the close of October I found the shop door closed, and learned to my dismay that our agent had disappeared, and the machines had all been seized for rent and debts.

What was to be done?

All the money I had in the world was about equivalent to £3. What was due to me I had left in our agent's hands and I felt sure it was lost. I thought of everything in the twenty-five minutes which elasped between my heart-breaking, when I found the shop-door closed, and my rapid walk to my lodgings.

Fortunately my room had been hired for the month and had been paid for in advance. I had at least a roof over my head for a few weeks. An idea suddenly struck me. I had been making an evening dress on the machine for a Russian lady who spoke English. She had some idea of buying a machine. In order to hasten the work I had taken to my room the body of her dress and having a machine there had sewed at it of nights. That machine I would certainly keep. It would go very little toward the payment of the debt the agent owed me.

I hurried home. Perhaps there was a letter with some money in it. There was nothing. I must find the lady, but how? She had left no address. She had hardly spoken to me. I thought I had heard her say she would come again, and I believed she had fixed on this very day. There was but one chance in a thousand. I must stand on the street and wait until she appeared.

I hastened back and took up my position near the shop. I scanned every woman passing by. It was bitterly cold and raw and the wind chilled me. I was faint with anxiety. Suddenly a carriage drove up, a footman opened the door and a lady, elegantly dressed, alighted. I tore across the street—it was the Russian lady.

With my heart in my mouth, I told her my pitiful story and begged her to help me. If she wanted a servant would she only try me? I had a sewing machine, and would make her dresses for nothing if I could only stay with her until I could write to my people at home; they would send me money and I could get back to England.

"And my dress—am I to lose it?" the lady asked impatiently.

"Not all of it. The skirt is in the shop; the body is in my room, almost finished.

It seemed to me dreadful that in my agony she should talk about her dress.

"Where do you live?" she inquired abruptly.

I told her.

"Get into the carriage," she said.

I did so.

When we were off the main street she stopped the carriage, got out with me, and we walked to my lodgings. I opened the door. On the table was her dress body. It did not seem to interest her. She picked it up, however, glanced at it a moment, then threw it down on a chair and examined the sewing machine.

"How long would it take me to become proficient in working this?" she inquired, as she sat down before the machine and tried the pedals.

"Two weeks—perhaps less."

"Would it disfigure my hands?"

She took off her gloves, showed her well-cared-for hands, her fingers glittering with rings.

"Your beautiful hands would hardly be spoiled."

"Well, then, give me a lesson at once—at once. I will pay you for your trouble."

She sat down, and under my instruction worked for an hour. She was wonderfully clever with her fingers, and seemed to seize the peculiarities of the machine at once.

"At this rate of progress, madam, you would become quite a good workwoman in ten days," I said approvingly.

She made no reply, but worked away for another half-hour.

"It is not so tiresome, after all," she said, "but I have had enough for to-day. To-morrow I will call, and then you will take the machine to pieces, and show me how it must be put together again. You will oblige me very particularly by not going out to-day. I have to thank you for your patience. Keep my visit silent. I hope you have learned that in Russia it is better to keep a quiet tongue. Do not return to the shop. Pray take this for my first lesson," and she placed on the machine table a piece of gold.

I felt very much inclined to kiss her. She looked cold and haughty, but my heart was so full of thankfulness that overcoming somewhat the awe I felt, I ventured to take her hand in mine and put it to my lips. She did not withdraw it.

"Poor child," she said; "you do not look more than 20, and, at your age, to be in such trouble! This must be a hard experience for you. Good-by until to-morrow."

She gazed at me steadfastly, as if she would look me through, and then bowing, left me.

Next morning early there was a low knock at my door. I opened it, and a woman plainly dressed entered. She did not say a word. She placed a bundle she held in her hand in a chair and at once went to the machine and commenced sewing.

"You will kindly forget the lady of yesterday, and know me as Elise simply, or rather, as Elise is French, we will say Eliza. I want to learn your trade. It is a whim of mine. Do you think that in a month I could earn my bread this way? I offer you a partnership. I can find the funds. The contents of the shop will probably be sold out, and you will be able to buy one of the machines for me. Now, will you take this one apart?"

I had not a word to say. I brought a wrench, a screw-driver, an oil-can, and loosened the working parts of the machine. She took the oil-can, and bent over the machine, studying it. I noticed that she touched with her white fingers all the grimy parts, until her hands were soiled.

"It is by no means so complicated as a revolver," she said.

I made no comment as I put the working parts together. She was very silent, working incessantly on some coarse material she had brought with her—I sat near her teaching her what to do. She worked on until it was past noon.

"Is it not time now to eat something?"

"It is," I replied; "will madam partake of my simple meal?"

"Madam! I am Eliza—and you say your name is Mary, I shall be very glad to share your food with you, if you will let me. If you have not enough for two, I will go out and buy what is wanted. What shall it be? I dare say I can shop better than you. Will you lend me your shawl, your furs and your overshoes?"

Before I could say a word she had them all on. Then she laughed for the first time and courtesied to me.

"Sister Mary, Sister Mary," she cried in great glee, "our copartnership begins from to-day. I am to be capital and you brains. Little sister, good-by. I shall not be gone more than a quarter of an hour."

I was so astonished as to be speechless. In a trice she was back, loaded down with packages. She had a loaf of bread, a piece of cheese, a pot of preserves, a breast of smoked goose and some salted cucumbers.

"I got a samovar, but it was too heavy for me to carry. The man I bought it of will bring it here at once. It is second-hand, but as good as new. I see you have a teapot. My only two extravagances were some good soap and a pound of the best tea. Come, let us eat. I can arrange anything. I am to wait on you."

In a day I learned to love that woman. All the haughty, proud manner was gone. She waited on me. She was up first in the morning. She was always busy. The porter of the house evidently mistook her for one of the two girls who had been in the employ of the sewing-machine company, for one or the other of them had often been in my room. Some small extra compensation was given him for the new lodger. She never spoke save in English, and her coming to me had been so mysterious that I felt quite certain the porter was entirely ignorant of her condition.

Certainly it worried me a great deal. More than once I ventured to ask for an explanation, but Eliza would place her hand on my mouth so that my speech was interrupted. It distressed me to see how hard she worked, for I felt sure that this new life was hurting her. I could see that from her pallor. If anything more than another made me feel sorry, it was for her beautiful hands. She seemed to take infinite pains in spoiling them.

"They are filthy—horrible" she would say, "and still I think I care for them more than I should. If I could only get a thick, red rough skin on them!"

As she said, the owner of the shop was only to glad to sell a machine. Eliza furnished the money. Work came to us in a mysterious way—left downstairs with the porter. By-and-by a fashionable dressmaker, who made dresses for the Court ladies, sent for me and gave me work. As what we had to do was well sewed, and we were always prompt, in less than three weeks we were doing a good business. My companion, save for the daily purchases made in the immediate neighborhood, never went out. No one called on her; she never received a letter. A few days over the month had passed, when one morning as I was running up a seam in a piece of cloth, my needle struck something. It was a piece of paper.

"It is for me, Sister Mary," said Eliza.

She took the bit of paper, held it to the stove, appeared to read something, and then opened the stove door and burned it. I did not question her. She worked on cheerfully all day, chatting on different subjects.

That night, when we were in bed, taking me in her arms, she said:

"Poor Mary, your troubles, your anxieties are now over. To-morrow, early, apply for your passport. It will cost you to go from here to London, say £30. I wish it could have been more, but you will have altogether £300, which after deducting your traveling expenses will leave you some money to begin your life with again. For me—who has learned to love a singularly honest and simple-minded woman—you shall have this ring." and she slipped on my finger a ring. "But don't wear it; the diamond might betray me. So far, Mary, you have run no risk; but next week you might be ruined forever, for you have harbored——"

I was speechless with terror.

"Only a woman," she continued, "whose own life—or the life of any one else who stood in her way—she would care no more of taking than a cook would of wringing a chicken's neck. Do not be shocked, Mary. I shall sleep as sweetly to-night as if death did not threaten me. My story, as far as relates to you, is soon told. It became necessary for me a month ago to disappear. The simplest chance in the world threw you in my way. Had you been of any other nationality than English I would never have trusted you. You might go out, Mary and sell me. Judas-like for a sum of money which would make you rich for life."

I clung convulsively to her and bade her be quiet.

"Through my veins, child, there runs the best blood in Russia, but every drop of it I will shed for the cause. Thank heaven for your lowly estate. You must go away to-morrow, and now good-night."

I begged her to come to England with me. She said:

"No my place is here. I should be useless there."

Then she complained of lassitude and presently went to sleep. I looked at her, her face pillowed on her arm, breathing as calmly as an infant, and thought her the loveliest woman I had evey seen.

Next morning, out of a package of some material, she produced, as if by magic, a roll of notes which, without counting, she handed to me.

"Later in the day there ought to arrive some furs for me, for poor Mary must not get cold. Now away with you."

Her old manner had returned.

"Get your passport. Go by Bremen to England, or the ice will delay you. Do not wait."

Still I was irresolute.

I could not bear to leave her.

I sobbed as if my heart would break. Then she knelt to me and implored me to go. At last I consented.

My passport was given to me at police headquarters without a word.

I returned to our room. As I stood at the landing a cheerful clatter of the machine was heard. Eliza was bending over her work, singing some plaintive air.

"Is it all right?" she asked, very quietly. "See, your furs have come. They are very beautiful, and so warm.

"I have permission to leave."

"Thank God! See my work. I think I could do now without you."

"You do not love me, Eliza," I cried.

"Not love you—my sister! I loved my husband—he was shot. I loved my only child; in the agony of my grief—because his father was killed—he sucked poison from my breast and died. After them I love you best."

Then, for the first time she burst in a paroxysm of tears.

"It is because I love you—that I might be your death."

As she rung my hand she felt the ring on my finger.

"Off with it. You wore your mittens at the police office! If they had seen it! Quick, let me hide it."

She took off my shoe and hid the ring in my stocking.

"Should you ever marry sell the ring or the stone in it, and you will not be portionless. Now off with you. I have made a bundle for you. The rest of your things you will give me. Here is a photograph of yours—you will let me keep it?"

She took me by the hand, gave me one long kiss, closed the door on me, and I never saw her more.

My trip home was without a single incident. My dear mother comforted me. Still there was some vague feeling of dread. My mind wandered in spite of all I could do toward my room companion. Picking up a newspaper when at home, some two weeks after my arrival, I read in the telegraphic dispatches:

"St. Petersburg, Dec. 13—An arrest of great importance has been made. One of the chief actors in the Nihilistic plots. a Russian Princess, was taken, but only after she had killed one of the police. Disguised as a sewing-machine woman she had hitherto baffled the detectives."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Chinese Dressing Gown.

One of the latest novelties in the way ot dressing gowns is the Chinese robe. Its simplicity is its chief charm, says the New York World. The goods must be narrow and cut in two straight pieces the length of the figure and sewed to the neck both front and back.

A small gore is placed in the breadth next to the back. A straight piece of the goods is then sewed together and placed from the shoulder to the gore to form the sleeves. When made from white or blue crepe lined with shrimp-pink silk it is a pretty and unique dressing gown. The half-sleeve falling back reveals just enough of a dimpled arm to be enticing, and the soft fold of the goods clinging to the neck presents quite a fascinating effect. If desired, the front pieces can be crossed and a silk cord and tassel tied loosely around the waist jauntily holds it in its proper place.

Smoke Blossom.

"Did you ever see a smoke blossom?" asked an old smoker. "Well, the way to make them is this: "Blow a ring in a still atmosphere and then watch it. The smoke making the ring revolves toward the center, as you look toward it. While it is floating away a part of the ring shoots away from the rest, forming a loop. When the two sides of this loop come almost together the loop seems to burst at its apex, and a lily-shaped blossom appears there. Sometimes this blossom will break up into smaller loops, and they will produce smaller smoke blossoms, as did the larger one. I cannot account for it, but a smoke ring invariably bears these queer blossoms."—New York Sun.

The Buffalo of Australia.

The wild Buffalo of Australia is remarkable for his heavy corrugated horns, almost four inches thick and square at the base. On account of the toughness of his hide, this animal is difficult to kill. An ordinary cartridge makes no impression upon him, and the Buffalo hunter must use extra heavy leaden bullets to bring him down. Possibly this quality will have the happy result of preserving the Australian buffalo for a more prolonged career of usefulness than our own late lamented American species has enjoyed.—Kate Field's Washington.

HIS SNAKE RECORD.

A Georgian Who Does Not Wish to Pose as Munchausen.

There is a citizen of Valdosta who has had some startling experiences with poisonous snakes during his life. He is entirely responsible, does not like notoriety and seldom talks of his adventures with reptiles, because he fears his recital of them would not be believed, and he does not care to figure as a Munchausen among snake story tellers.

Some time ago he was attracted by the laughing of a child who was at play in the front yard. Looking through the window he discovered to his horror that the child was playing with a great live rattlesnake, which sprang its warning rattle just as the child was rescued from what would have been certain death.

At another time recently, while wading in a branch, he stepped on a large water moccasin, and narrowly escaped being bitten, as he had crushed the body of the reptile and aroused its wrath. It did show fight, however, chasing him to dry land.

"On still another occasion," says this hero of many battles with snakes, "I had cause to tramp all day with companions in a swamp, and it was during snake time of the year. During that day I had the misfortune to step on as many as three live and wriggling moccasins at different times, but had the good luck, as usual to get off without having their poisonous fangs struck into my flesh. No other one of the party had such close calls. It all fell to my lot.

At another time, while I was pushing my way through a thick and boggy swamp, one of my feet broke through the moss-coevred mud, and it threw me forward. I caught at a tussock just by me, and threw my hand on a large moccasin. It flinched, but did not move. I was stuck in the mud. Its forked tongue flashed in my face! I could not get up without a struggle, and I was afraid to make the effort, fearing that a movement on my part would bring a strike in the face! I held my breath, while my hand went to my belt, and I drew therefrom a pistol. In an instant I got in the first blow, and the snake's head went off. A friend stood on a tussock five feet away watching the tragedy—in one act.

"Recently I was hunting cows in the pine woods. I rode a mule. I was going at a slow lope. Suddenly the beast threw its head down with a snort and plowed the earth with both fore hoofs in a desperate effort to take up. I went over the horn of the saddle and astride of the mule's neck and would have pitched over my head on the spot had I not seized the animal's ears, one in each hand, as I struggled wildly to prevent a fall. My head and chest went full over his head, but my grip on the long ears and my feet locked around its neck saved me for the time. Thus poised in a ridiculous attitude, my beast regained its footing and then began backing and slamming me about against brush and sapling, until I rolled off on the ground. When I gained my feet I discovered a large rattlesnake in a coil under a palmetto bush, just in front of the spot, where the mule made the desperate effort to stop, and if I had gone over the animal's head I would have fallen head formost upon the deadly reptile.

"More wonderful to relate, a little toddler who was burdened with my name came across a rattler one day and picked it up, and went running around playing with it until an older brother discovered the child's peril and jerked it away from the snake."

ATHLETICS AND BRAINS.

Statistics Which Prove That Mentality Is Often Allied to Music.

To infer that athletics are related to scholarship as cause to effect would be unwarranted, writes President Hyde, of Bowdoin, in the Forum. But observation does show conclusively that excellent physical development, which is an indispensable condition of success in athletics, is also a favorable condition of success in scholarship. It explodes the popular fallacy that the mind and body of the scholar are in inverse proportion, and shows that they stand in the closest correlation. * * * The awards of the Smyt mathematical prize in Bowdoin College for the past six classes present a remarkable if not a representative phenomenon. This prize of $300 is based on a course in mathematics, extending over two years, and is the most important college prize. Of six consecutive recipients of this prize, the first was the winner of the quarter-mile run, the second was the pitcher of the college base ball nine, the third was the most brilliant performer on the trapeze, the fourth was a man of good physical development without special atheltic attainments. the fifth was the catcher of the college base ball nine and the best general athlete in college, the sixth is a candidate for a position on the college boat crew and will next year be a member of the foot ball eleven.

The Biggest Man in the German Army.

Until quite lately, Captain Pluskow, of the first regiment of Guards, had been considered the biggest man in the German army. He measured over 80in. in height. But a short time since a young Rhindlander joined the first regiment of Foot Guards as a "One year's volunteer," who attains the colossal height of over 7ft. 4in. Since 1850 the first regiment of Guards has not had so tall a man. At that time they had a man who was so tall that everything, even his bedstead, had to be made specially for him. His accoutrements are preserved still among the curios of the regiment.

SOUND VERSUS SENSE.

How a Child's Mispronunciations Color Many of His Ideas.

"I was calling the other day," says a philosophic woman, "on a lady whose 7-year-old son prefers his books to his baseball, and finds the joys of his new safety bicycle less than the joys of a new book of fairy tales.

"Master Charley lay face downward on the wide window seat deep in the mysteries of the 'Arabian Nights,' when without looking up, and unconscious of the fact that we were talking, he broke in upon our conversation with, 'Mamma, how much is a squeen?'

"For a moment mamma was puzzled; then it dawned upon her that 'sequin' was the word called 'squeen' by Master Charley.

After he had discovered by consulting Webster that a sequin in Venice is worth $2.50 and in Turkey $1.85, the talk fell upon the curious impressions often left upon a child's mind by his mispronunciation of a word. I remember quite well reading the account of a shipwreck where the narrator said: 'My very vitals were frozen with terror.' This I pronounced as if spelled 'vittals,' while the signification to my mind was as if the word had been 'victuals,' and I could not comprehend how terror could freeze food.

"Long years ago, when my little brother and I were saving all our pennies to buy the New York Ledger, which we did quite surreptitiously with the connivance and financial aid of the nurse, we eagerly devoured the fascinating tale of 'Carmel the Scout,' discussing the while the amusing peculiarities of a certain character named Peleg, whom, with childish artlessness, we called 'Pelge.' I have forgotten every detail of that marvelvelous story except this wonderful name.

"Hotel I called hot-el asking mother what a 'hot-el' was. Supposing from my separation of the syllables that the word was 'hovel' she replied that it was a poor miserable hut, and I read all through the story trying to reconcile the elegant description of my 'hot-el' with my idea of a poor, miserable hut.

"The little girl has been celebrated in song and story who after hearing the ministers read; 'For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is,' asked her mother 'What is miz?' and as she happened to be a little girl of my acquaintance I can vouch for the truth of the story."

An Unbidden and Unwelcome Guest

Is pain, and often it abides with us for years, if not for life. When it visits us in the guise of rheumatism or neuralgia, it may be checked before it obtains an abiding foothold in our bodily tenement with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, most effective of blood depurents and anodynes. The Bitters also removes liver and kidney complaints, constipation, nervousness, malaria and dyspepsia.

The world is full of suffering women and nervous men whose lives might be brightened by consulting Dr. Frank Powell (White Beaver,) of St. Paul, Minn., who makes a specialty of such diseases.

Many men do not smoke, yet there are but few who object to an occasional puff.

Dr. Frank Powell, (White Beaver,) who recently located in St. Paul, has already established a practice second to none in the city. His La Crosse, Wis., business was said to be the largest in the badger State, and most of it has followed him to St. Paul. His specialties, the diseases of women and the nervous diseases of men keep his magnificent offices in Union block filled with sufferers of both sexes.

A man's idea of being good to a woman is to give her opportunities to be good to him.

WHY HE WAS FEELING SO BLUE.

He Was the Life of the Party the Night Before, but Something Went Wrong.

"What's the matter old man?" he said as they met the morning after. "You look blue."

"I feel blue."

"But last night you were the jolliest member of the party."

"I felt jolly.

"I felt like one."

"You said your wife had gone away for the first time in three years, and there wasn't any one to say a word if you went home and kicked over the mantel clock."

"I remember it."

"You said that if you staid out until 4 o'clock there was no one to look at you reproachfully and sigh and make you feel mean."

"Yes, and I staid out until 4 o'clock, didn't I?"

"You certainly did."

"And I gave an Indian warhoop on the doorstep?"

"Yes, you sang a verse from a comic opera song and tried to dance a clog."

"And my wife had missed the train. Now go away and leave me. I want to kick myself a little more for not taking the precaution to get an affidavit from the conductor that she went with the train."

THE MIDNIGHT VISITOR.

"Whose steps are those? Who comes so late?"
"Let me come in, the door unlock."
"'Tis midnight now; my lonely gate
I open to no stranger's knock;

"Who art thou? Speak!" "Men call me Fame;
To immortality I lead."
"Pass, idle phantom of a name,"
"Listen again, and now take heed.

"'Twas false. My names are Song, Love, Art,
My poet, now unbar the door."
"Art's dead, Song cannot touch my heart,
My once Love's name I chant no more."

"Open then now, for see I stand,
Riches my name, with endless gold,
Gold, and your wish in either hand."
"Too late—my youth you still withold."

"Then if it must be, since the door
Stand shut, my last true name do know,
Men call me Death. Delay no more;
I bring the cure of every woe."

The door flies wide. "Ah, guest so wan,
Forgive the poor place where I dwell;
An ice-cold hearth, a heart-sick man,
Stand here to welcome thee full well."

A SISTER'S TREACHERY.

BY HATTIE KYLE.

Six o'clock. The hands in M'Ardley's factory stood ready, shawled, and bonneted, waiting for the signal of dismissal, and when the clamor of the noisy bell broke on the air, they were out in the streets of Lowell, pushing, jostling, hurrying like a flock of frightened sheep released from bondage.

The crowd dispersed in twos and threes, but Margaret Miller walked apart. There was no companionship for her in all that noisy throng, no companionship in all the wide world. A strange life for so young a woman to lead, but those who would win love must earn it, and Margaret neither wished nor courted human sympathy. But perhaps for her there was some excuse.

An orphan, just old enough to feel her loss, she had gone from a happy home of luxury to distant kindred less akin than strangers. She had fed upon the bitter bread, of charity, loathing its taste the while, until she was old enough to toil for her own support.

The father, who had seemed to her childish eyes all goodness, was spoken of with a convert sneer, as one who had failed in his duty to his children and the world. The baby sister whom she idolized was separated from her, as their guardians had agreed. Her sister's guardian was wealthy, and this adopted child was destined for a little of fashion, while Margaret's was a plain man, who looked upon the world as a great workshop.

The children with whom she lived looked upon the homeless orphan as an interloper who robbed them of so much of the good things of this life as fell to her share; and Margaret, proud and passionate and impulsive grew morose and bitter, and lived within herself, as far remote as possible from those who worked under the same roof, yet continued to eat at the same table.

There had been but one bright spot in all the dull years. One drop of honey in her cup of life, and that had turned to bitterest gall.

Margaret at seventeen had been a wonderful beauty, and her great black eyes and peachy color had caught the fancy of John M'Ardley's son, who had taken no pains to conceal his admiration, but sought her company whenever it was possible.

At last it grew a common thing for him to walk beside her in the winter twilight, on the road that lay between the factory and her home, and these walks were the events of Margaret's life, and there were tender whisperings that would have been highly disapproved by the young man's prudent father had they come to his ears.

Margaret grew very gentle in these days. It was so sweet to think that some one watched for her coming, when the weary day's work was over—that some one thought of her when she was absent. So sweet to know that some one loved her, that she was tender to all the world for that one's sake. The girls began to grow fonder of Margaret, and some, even when they guessed the secret of the change, clung to her still, while others were filled with envy and spite toward the girl who was no better than they, yet aspired to the friendship of John M'Ardley's son.

But all this came to a sudden end, and Margaret never knew the reason. She could only guess that the young man's father objected to their intercourse, for he had met them once or twice together. They parted as tenderly as ever, but there was no leave-taking, and shortly after Arthur M'Ardley left his native town, and for five long years she heard no more of him. This love which had seemed so much to her, was, with him, but an idle fancy.

But there had been a nine days' wonder and gossip about young M'Ardley and Margaret Miller, and Margaret resented this, and was shyer than ever of the girls who had so concerned themselves with her affairs. Those who disliked her increased in their dislike, and those who would have been kind to her grew tired of kindness which met with no return.

Margaret went slowly homeward, thinking, as she sometimes did, even yet of her boyish lover, how eagerly she had quickened her footsteps that he might not think she waited for him.

The days were so like one another. She should go home to eat and sleep. Perhaps spend an hour or two over her sewing, silent, while others talked of things that were less than nothing to her. But this day was destined to be unlike all the rest—a day never to be forgotten.

There was a letter awaiting her, a letter bordered in black and signed Bessie Miller, the sister from whom she had parted so many years before.

It told of her guardian's death, and offered, nay forced, on Margaret's acceptance an equal share of the fortune which had fallen to his adopted child when his affairs were all arranged.

"And Margaret," said the writer, you are my darling sister; though I have forgotten even how you looked when they took us from each other. I have loved you all my life-long, and you must come and live with me, and we shall be so happy together".

And Margaret went, rejoicing.

It was a snowy day in winter, when Margaret alighted at the house that was to be her home. Bessie flew to meet her. Standing at the portal, with her golden hair blown backward from her smiling face, and a welcome spoken with lips and eyes and outstretched hands, she looked to Margaret's eyes like an angel at the gate of Paradise.

When the first greeting was over Margaret and Bessie sat together before the fire of glowing anthracite, talking of the past. Margaret in a great "Sleepy Hollow" chair, and Bessie on a little ottoman at her feet. They were as different as sisters well could be. One tall, dark, and stately; the other a diminutive blonde with a fairy like figure, and full of life and motion, and pretty winning ways.

As they sat there, deep in reminiscences, Bessie fell to caressing her sister's hands with hers, patting them softly, laying them against her rosy cheek, and Margaret, feeling the gentle touch, looked down and thought with a sudden pang, how different they were. Those tiny rose-tipped fingers made her own look so large and coarse.

"They have the factory stamp on them, Bessie," said the elder sister, and Bessie, who had been thinking of anything rather than this, blushed with embarrassment, and then sprang from her seat and threw her arms around her sister's neck for the hundredth time since their meeting, calling her various endearing names, and for a while they were very happy.

"The stamp of the factory is on me," she said. "Money can never give me back what I have lost. She might have been the drudge and I a lady with soft white hands, but for the merest chance.

But the morning brought better thought. No one could long have lived with Bessie Miller without partaking somewhat of her happy nature. She was a living sunbeam, a creature like the birds and flowers, rejoicing that she lived; but underneath her gayety there was a well of pure, deep feeling which Margaret could not understand.

Her delicate intuition taught her the bitterness of her sister's life, and she was very tender of her feelings. The envy and jealousy of all things lovelier or better than herself, the bitter feelings nourished by the life Margaret had led, would betray themselves at times, and strive as she would, Bessie could not fail to see them. But when the serpent's head peeped out she tried her best to smother it with flowers. And Margaret grew less bitter day by day, and gained an interest in life she had never before possessed. She never felt her deficiencies of education or manner in her sister's presence, and found herself well received among her sister's friends, at first for Bessie's sake and finally for her own.

One evening the two were sitting alone; the elder idly dreaming—she was always idle now—the younger planting roses in a barren field of canvas.

"Margaret," said Bessie, in a voice that was scarcely more than a breath, "I have something to tell you. I wanted to tell you before."

Margaret laughed and roused herself to listen. One look at the blue eyes, glowing like winter stars, the little mouth quivering with its tender smile, told Margaret what the "something" was.

"Come, Bessie, and tell me all about it now. Better late than never."

So Bessie left her needle in a half blown rose and nestled in her favorite seat at Margaret's feet.

"Margaret," said she, "some one likes me," then hid her crimson face in Margaret's draperies.

"How very strange!" said the other, laughing. "Is that all?"

This time Bessie drew her sister down to her with both her hands, and whispered in her ear, as though it were a guilty secret that she was engaged to be married, and the day was set.

"And who is the happy man?" said Margaret. "Who am I to have for a brother-in-law?"

Just then the door bell rang, and Bessie sprang to her former position just as two gentlemen were announced,

"Mr. M'Ardley," Margaret heard the servant say, and the name came to her like a voice from the buried past. She could have prayed it might not be the one whom she had known.

But there he stood, not greatly changed. She had ceased to care for him, yet she could not feel to him as to a stranger. It seemed like living in a dream to hear his voice and touch his hand again.

Of all else that passed that evening Margaret was unconscious. His voice was the only one that had a meaning to her. She wondered at first if he had recognized her, changed as she was and in her altered circumstances. But she found that he remembered all. He spoke of their former intercourse as a boy and girl friendship, and totally ignored the manner of their parting. But his voice was low and tender, and Margaret felt the influence of other days creeping over her, and knew that he wished she would. Meanwhile Bessie chatted and laughed with the stranger, and these two talked of the long ago.

"How do you like him?" said the younger sister when the gentlemen had taken their departure.

"Like him? why, Bessie, I am ashamed to say. I hardly noticed what he was like. You know most of my observation was taken up with Mr. M'Ardley. We are old friends, and we had a great deal to say."

"Why, what are you thinking of, Margaret? It is Arthur I mean. Did I not tell you? I gave you ample opportunity to make his acquaintance."

And Bessie laughed her merry, joyous laugh at her sister's astonished countenance.

But Margaret rose up, fierce and angry.

"I hate him!" she cried, and "I hate you!" she might have added, for the thought was in her heart. But Bessie, pale and trembling, put her hand upon the angry lips.

"Oh! tell me what is the matter, sister, darling sister," she pleaded, and Margaret, frightened at her own angry words, stood still and thought how she could mend them.

"Has my Arthur done anything wrong, anything to offend you?"

Margaret made no answer; she would have given worlds to recall the hasty, breath but she was forced to tell the story at last. And her sister listened with tearful eyes. Inconstancy seemed such a terrible thing to this faithful heart.

"Margaret, said she, "I can never marry Arthur M'Ardley now."

But Margaret begged her to forget what she had told her, and they parted for the night with fond embraces.

Alone in her own chamber Bessie thought till the morning broke.

He was Margaret's first love as he was hers; but perhaps it had not been as Margaret thought; perhaps it had been but a boyish fancy, and Arthur must not suffer if his happiness depended on herself. Come what might, she resolved to do her duty unselfishly and cheerfully. Poor Margaret! she had had but little sweetness in her life. It might be that Arthur had loved her truly in those early days and only forsaken her upon compulsion.

So ended her meditation. Time passed on and day by day she watched the two, and saw, or thought she saw, that they loved each other still, and as this conviction forced itself upon her, Arthur M'Ardley's image faded from her breast.

He who knoweth all things alone could know the secret of that innocent heart. If she suffered she gave no sign, and Margaret, guessing nothing of what was passing in her sister's mind, and believing her happy in Arthur's love, felt all the old, bad feelings return with double force, and sets herself the task of winning Arthur M'Ardley's love, scarcely thinking of the end of her triumph, but resolved to punish him in some way for the unhappiness he had caused her. She strove her best to fascinate and dazzle him, and he, quite willing to be entertained by a handsome woman, entered with zest into a flirtation, all the while reserving such love as he possessed for the one who was to be his wife. But in all this Bessie saw only the signs of feeling that could not be repressed, and one day when the two were sitting together she came and sat beside them with a resolute look in her earnest blue eyes.

"Arthur," she said, "the day that has been fixed for our wedding is close at hand, but I must say what I have to say before that time."

She begged of her sister not to leave them, and then, in a clear, steady voice, she told Arthur M'Ardley her feelings had changed, that she no longer felt any stronger regard than friendship, and that she hoped he would try to forgive and forget her. She hinted of no change in him, of no reason for the alteration in her feeling, and Arthur, utterly abashed, and knowing well what cause he had given her, listened in silence, tongue-tied in Margaret's presence.

Next morning there came to the door a missive in Arthur's hand, addressed to Bessie Miller. As the letter was placed in Margaret's hand, she stood in her dressing-room, holding her sister's costly wedding-dress.

There was no question of right or wrong, only a mad determination to know what passed betwten Bessie and Authur M'Ardley. Margaret opened the letter, and read what was never meant for her eyes—tender, penitent words, warm with love for which she would have bartered her existence. Pleading humbly for forgiveness, for that heart which he had lost through his own misdeeds, and through and under it all a hint, not anywhere written but subtly exprsssed, that the fault was not all his own.

A light step sounded along the passage, and Margaret tore the paper with an angry hand, and cast it at her feet, crushing it under the folds of the snowy satin.

Bessie looked in and seeing what she held cried out:

"Oh, Margaret, please put the dress away, and never let me see it again.

Margaret laid the dress and paper away in an unused drawer. But for the confession it involved of her own treachery she might even yet have given her sister the letter; but as it was, she said to herself that Arthur M'Ardley might make his peace in his own way.

That night Arthur bent above Bessie with his whole soul in his eyes and asked her if she had anything new to say.

"I have not changed my mind," she said quite coldly, and Arthur went, vowing never to enter the house again.

For a time the sisters saw no more of him. They ceased even to speak of him, but after a time Margaret met him frequently, and Bessie knew of the meetings, and was glad that all had come to pass as she had planned, and would have been as gay and happy as ever but for a sudden illness that came upon her. It was heart disease, the doctor said, and a sudden shock might be her death. but with care she might recover. So Bessie gave up all pleasures that tended to excitement, and remained at home to guard her health.

One night there was a party to the opera proposed by a lady at whose house Margaret and Arthur M'Ardley frequently met. Both the sisters were invited, but Bessie pleaded illness.

That evening Arthur sat beside Margaret in the crowded opera-house, and in the pauses of the music asked her to make him happy with the promise of her hand, and Margaret promised, regardless of her revenge, reckoning little whether pique or love had made him so soon forget her sister, for this was the anniversary of Bessie's wedding-day.

He assisted her from the carriage on their return, and with his last touch on her hand, his last word in her ear, Margaret sped up the stairs to her own apartment. At Bessie's door she paused and looked within. The shutter was open wide, the long curtain loosened from its fastenings blew half across the room, the gaslight flickered and flared, and on the floor lay a heap af snowy satin and lace, her sister's discarded wedding-robe.

Margaret's pulses stood still. There was but a step from her to the bed that was hidden by its massive headboard, but that seemed a yawning gulf. It was taken, and there lay pretty Bessie, the color fled forever from her lips and cheeks, her little fingers clasping fast a tattered paper—the paper Margaret knew so well.

Her sister had loved and trusted her with a boundless love and faith, and the knowledge of Margaret's treachery had pierced that tender heart as absolutely as though the cruel hand had held a murderous knife. For a moment Margaret hoped that she was dying, too, but the horror that swept her frame left her alive to remorse and agony it seemed to her for evermore.

When Arthur M'Ardley came to look upon that lifeless form the love that had been the purest feeling of his heart, came back to overwhelm him with a hopeless sorrow.

"Oh, Bessie! little Bessie!" he cried; "I loved you better than my life."

There was no word of explanation or leavetaking between Margaret and her oldtime lover, but the two looked into each other's eyes and knew that they must part.

They never met again. Margaret is an aged woman now. The world died to her with Bessie's death, and life since then has been a long, unceasing penance, but sometimes in her dreams she sees her sister's radiant form and hears her voice, not stern or angry, not reproachful, but pleading gently for her sinful sister, forgiving and pitiful as in her life. And Margaret full of contrition and penitence, looks forward not quite despairing to the life beyond.

HANDY WITH THE FISTS.

Actors Who Could Hold Their Own In a Fight.

Edwin Forrest was a fighter, and had the very worst kind of temper. Here are a couple of stories about him told by one who knew him well. The doors had just been opened and the audience was just beginning to come in. The stage was empty and dark. The visitor stood talking with the theater official who had conducted him there, when they were startled by a woman's shriek, followed by a hoarse, inarticulate growl that swelled into a roar, and as they turned to the direction whence the sounds emanated they saw a woman in white fairly fly across the stage closely pursued by a big man, who limped as he ran and was swearing big oaths with every breath. "Oh, said the manager in reply to his hurried question. "It is only Forrest having a quarrel with his leading lady," and he added, apologetically, "they do not get along together very well," The famous tragedian was playing at the Globe Theater in this city what proved to be his last engagement; he suffered frightfully from gout in his feet, and it was a task his dresser greatly dreaded to put on his shoes. One evening, when his feet were very much swollen, the dresser was having his customary bad quarter-hour, when a note was passed in the door. The envelope was large and square, and bore a monogram, and it was addressed in what appeared to be a lady's handwritting. One shoe was on when Forrest opened and read the note. The aristocratic-looking missive read something to this effect: The writer had been at the theater the previous evening and noticed with a great deal of sympathy that Forrest limped. He hoped the tragedian would not permit himself to suffer long, as by coming to the writer's address the troublesome corns would be removed without pain, and on account of the writer's admiration for the actor's genius no charge would be made. The instant Forrest grasped the full import of the letter he let out a howl, and jumping up with a suddenness which overturned the dresser, he began tramping around the room, throwing his arms around like a madman and repeating again and again as he clutched the air with nervous fingers: "'Oh, if I only had that man here! Oh, if I only had that man here!"

Edwin Booth, who always threw the mantle of charity over the weaknesses of his father, tells many stories of the great actor's testiness and pugnacity. Here is one in Edwin's language: "My last experience of his vagaries was at our final parting on the ship that bore him forever from me. He asked a sailor on deck to take his luggage to the cabin. The fellow replied: 'I'm no flunkey.' 'What are you, sir!' demanded my father. 'I'm a thief,' responded the brute. Instantly my father put on his fiercest scowl, struck an attitude and said, 'Your hand, comrade, I'm a pirate!'" Edwin Booth himself will fight when occasion demands. Once a discharged member of his company went to his dressing-room and began to bully him. Picking up a sword from the corner Booth roared out, "Down on your knees, you scoundrel, and pray for mercy, for I'm going to cut your heart out and eat it before your eyes." The terrible nature of the threat frightened the man into a nervous fit that lasted some time, and yet he must have known that Booth was only acting.

OSTENTATION AT FUNERALS.

Customs That Seem to Be Opposed to the Teaching of Christianity.

It is a sad commentary on a christian community, which takes that distinctive title from a religion whose founder is called the Consoler, because his word plucks the sting from death that it surrounds death with every circumstance of woe and gloom, writes George William Curtis in Harper's Magazine. The distinctive ministry of the faith seems to fall at the very point to which it is especially addressed. The natural christian tone at the burial of the dead would seem to be the cheer that springs from the thougut of immortality—a sublime hope, a tender resignation. The christian thought in that hour should instinctively dwell upon the soul, not upon the body, and the simplest and most unostentatious rite of burial would seem to be the most truly christian. But the ostentation of christian funerals has become so great that burial reform associations are formed, both in this country and in England, to relieve the poor of the painful and needless cost which, from mistaken respect for the dead, they will not spare so long as ostentation is the custom.

He Secured Lodgings at Last.

Allen Wilson, an old college man of St. Louis, says: "While I was at Yale an incident occurred that furnished amusement to the police for weeks. Some of us were at the station house one winter's evening for the purpose of bailing out two of our comrades who had been arrested for skylarking. While we were waiting a great hulking tramp came in and asked the lieutenant in charge, a rather dudish fellow, to give him a night's lodging. Not satisfied with the refusal he received, he persisted. The lieutenant soon lost patience and said: 'No one can sleep here unless he has committed some crime.' 'Is that so?' said the tramp; 'that's pretty hard, but I suppose I can help it; how will this answer?' As he spoke he shot out his fist and knocked the lieutenant from his stool into the spittoons near the stove. 'I hope I didn't hurt you more than was necessary,' he said, as his victim slowly picked himself up, his nose streaming blood;' give me as good a cell as you have, for I'm tired and want to go to sleep.' The unfortunate lieutenant did not hear the end of it for months."

A Metallic Diet.

The London Lancet has just recorded a remarkable case. The body of an Arab, who was a stowaway on a ship which had just arrived, was found in the hold and was conveyed to the Seaman's hospital at Greenwhich, where a post mortem was made: The physicians noticed that the body was greatly emaciated, and on opening it there were found in the alimentary canal twenty trouser buttons, three cog-wheels, apparently portions of a watch, a two-inch steel screw which was bent double, a one-inch screw, six pieces of a lock, the largest half an inch long and half an inch broad, a circular piece of brass, several pieces of iron wire, some bits of brass and lead, and two key tallies on a ring an inch long. The man had eaten these things when sterving.

Truly blessed is the man who finds life too short to cherish a grudge.

"German Syrup"

Asthma. "I have been a great sufferer from Asthma and severe Colds every Winter, and last Fall my friends as well as myself thought because of my feeble condition, and great distress from constant coughing, and inability to raise any of the accumulated matter from my lungs, that my time was close at hand. When nearly worn out for want of sleep and rest, a friend recommended me to try thy valuable medicine, Boschee's German Syrup. I am confident it saved my life. Almost the first dose gave me great relief and a gentle refreshing sleep, such as I had not had for weeks. My cough began immediately to loosen and pass away, and I found myself rapidly gaining in health and weight. I am pleased to inform thee—unsolicited—that I am in excellent health and do certainly attribute it to thy Boschee's German Syrup. C. B. STICKNEY, Picton, Ontario."

Gentle, Refreshing Sleep.

The explosion of a bomb is not more sudden or unlooked for than the attack of some malignant disease which would not occur were the blood in order. To impure blood is due a great variety of ills that make life a burden.

All the year round, you may rely upon Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery to purify the blood and invigorate the system. It's not like the sarsaparillas, that are said to be good for the blood in March, April and May. The "Discovery" works equally well at all times, and in all cases of blood-taints, or humors, no matter what their name or nature.

$25.00 HARNESS FOR $16.50

IN GENUINE RUBBER $18.50.

DESCRIPTION OF HARNESS.

A fine Buggy Harness stitched twelve stitches to the inch, except traces which are stitched ten. It is made to represent a $40 harness. It has a 3/4 or 3 1/2 hand laced, leather pad saddle, with covered seat and jockeys; is made from fine stock. Bridle is of usual dimensions, has fine blinds, nice leather front and beautiful rosettes with glass centers, nice nickel bit. Check-rein, either overdraw with nose piece, or side check. Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strap, breeching and crimped traces are made either of patent enamel or plain harness leather as preferred, and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased, give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Boxloops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

A Little Girl's Experience in A Lighthouse.

Mr. and Mrs. Loren Trescott are keepers of the Gov. Lighthouse at Sand Beach, Mich. and are blessed with a daughter, four years old. Last April she was taken down with Measles, followed with a dreadful Cough and turning into a Fever. Doctors at home and at Detroit treated her, but in vain, she grew worse rapidly, until she was a mere "handful of bones".—Then she tried Dr. King's New Discovery and after the use of two and a half bottles, was completely cured. They say Dr. King's New Discovery is worth its weight in gold, yet you may get a trial bottle free at W. A. Schreiters Drugstore.

The day We Celebrate.

This week, the day we celebrate. wil be the annivesary of that ever-memorable one on which what is now about the most prosperous, smartest, liveliest, and most intelligent nation on earth was born. We join pretty generally in this celebration, and yet it cannot have the same significance to everybody. The Irishman has a peculiar feeling for St. Patrick's Day: the Norwegian is particulary enthused by the 17th of May; the Afro-American has two great days, August 1st Birth-day and wedding-day are numerously celebrated, but they interest only small circles of people. But for each individual of all the millions who have traveled over the Burlington lines, there is a day which he can join all the rest (whatever be their nationality) in celebrating; and that is the day that each took his firs tride on "The Burlington," the line that goes everwhere. For ickets, rates, etc., you should apply to the nearest railroad ticket agent, or write to W. J. C. KENYON, Gen. Pass Agent, St. Paul Minn.

Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O.Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the payment of the money secured by a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Napoleon Fontaine of Polk county, state of Minnesota, mortgagor, to Alzina A. Wylly, guardian of Lyman D. Goodrich, mortgagee, bearing date the twelfth day of May, 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, on the 12th day of May, 1882, at 10:40 o'clock a. m., in book G of mortgages on pages 454, 455, 456, 457. Which said mortgage, together with the debt secured thereby, was duly assigned by said Alzina A. Wylly as guardian of Lyman D Goodrich, mortgagee, to Lyman D. Goodrich, of the State of Florida, by written assignment dated the 18th day of November, 1885, and recorded in the office of said register of deeds, on the 24th day of April, 1891, at 8:20 o'clock a. m. in book 56 of mortgage deeds on pages 215-216 and no action or proceeding having been instituted at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof. The amount claimed to be due upon said mortgage at the date hereof, is the sum of three hundred fourteen dollars, besides the sum of sixty eight and 60-100 dollars for taxes necessarily paid by said mortgagee and interest, and twenty-five dollars, attorney's fees, stipulated for in said mortgage. Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, viz: The south east quarter of section three in township one hundred and forty nine north of range forty-four west containing one hundred and sixty acres more or less according to the government survey thereof in Polk county and state of Minnesota, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, or his deputy, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 13th day of July, 1891, at 2 o'clock p. m. of that day.

THIS IS THE EAGLE

That Screamed in Red Lake Falls On July Fourth—And it Will be Seen

He is a Husky Eagle, too—Our Celebration a Grand Success.

Nothing That Goes to Make up a Gala Day Overlooked by Those in Charge.

The most indifferent citizen can scarcely repress a patriotic impulse when the morning of July 4th dawns. The mere fluttering of the Stars and Stripes in the breeze, a loud hurrah, a bomb exploding, lights the fire of enthusiasm. When grander sights and sounds meet the eye and ear nobler impulses spring up, and ere one knows it, the echo brings back his own voice shouting with the multi tude. Despite what humorists or rancorous writers may say to belittle this day it is a grand one and its observance is a national necessity. To assemble on this day, to hear rousing patriotic choruses, and listen to oratarical gems that have the true ring, to stand united beneath one flag, and recount the many blessings that descend upon us as beneficiaries of our grand nation is indeed meet and good, and besides keeps the flame of patriotism smoldering and reassuring. Without doubt July 4th, 1891 witnessed the best celebration we have yet had. The parade was one of the principal features. It formed at the depot and begun the march at about 9 a. m. The Red White and Blue was represented by Misses Brady, Ralph and Fletcher, each mounted on a sterling roadster. Costumes were beautiful and the naive madiens captured many a heart. S. J. Sprague, marshal of the day, and James F. Homes, president of the day, were also at the head of the procession. The ragmuffins element was numerous and added much to the grotesque humor of the occasion. Many of our business houses were represented, among whom we noted: H. A. McClatchie and company hardware and farming implements. The generosity of this firm was exemplified in the gratuitious presentation all along the time of march of tin caps for the little ones. H. B. Davis drove a team attached to a hay rake, to represent his farming impelement business. J. N. Nimesgerns display was one of the completest—a regular house on wheels. Several masked creatures performed devions, dutiesand dispersing peanuts along the route. L. A. Kaufer had a rack ornamented with several fine sets of harnesses which made a a very attractive showing. WmFindeisen represented his wagon works, and above him was a motto, "Patronize Home Industry." (It might be well for our citizens to follow this wholesome advice.) Napoleon Morisette, the tonsorial artist, was there and in the most comical style imaginable. It would be impossible to mention the different individuals who were mounted on horses. Helmuth Zaiser as Uncle Sam, rode his bicycle. The thirteen original states and the goddess of Liberty made an attractive portion of the parade. Miss Martha Garvais charmingly represented the Goddess of Liberty, her long beautiful hair being very convenient. for the character The burlesque on the fire department was as timely as usual. Soon those boys will be large enough to form a regular company. The parade was the best we ever had and will be an incentive to future efforts.

Arrived at the grounds where platform and stands had been erected, the band rendered several national airs. The glee club sung America, after which Miss Emma Zaiser read theDeclaration of Independemce P. G? Falardeau gave an oration in English and Rev. Fr. Arpin spoke in French. The Glee club then sung Red White and Blue. After this dancing was instituted on the platform and the other sports commenced. Ice cream was served by the ladies of the Presbyterian church at the grounds and in Kretzschmar block in the evening. The net receipts were $60. The dinner on the Island was given by ladies of St. Joseph's church. Their receipts were also large. The dance in the evening at Kretzschmar hall was largely attended. The music was superb. The dance terminated the Fourth of July festivities for 1891, and it is safe to say everybody who was capable of enjoying a Fourth of July celebration enjoyed this. The day had been perfect in point of weather.

The fire works as advertised did not take place, but J. D. Marshall had a fine display at his residence. The illuminations could be seen all over town, and a more beautiful sight can scarcely be imagined than the glare of the colored lights mid the thick foliage, and the cutlines of the forms that flitted fitfully about. A large number of invited guests took part in the sport. A baloon ascension terminated the fete.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 8th, 1891.—Secretary Rusk, of the department of agriculture, or "Uncle Jerry Rusk," as he is fondly called here, is just now the busiest man in the whole government. The president has gone to CapeMay to spend a month or two; Secretary Blaine is in Bar Harbor sick, but recuperating; Secretaries Noble and Foster found time to go away and spend the Fourth. But Secretary Rusk has to stay and attend to business. He has a score or more of microscopists at work in Chicago on the great American hog with a view to preparing the latter for a more cordial welcome in foreign markets. He is bursting baloons in the heavens to produce rain, and is bringing up to perfection some kind of new grass, which shall flourish like a Green Bay Tree in the arid deserts of the far West. Secretary Rusk has for some time been testing the relative value of grasses in an endeavor to find one that will exist and flourish in localities which suffer from a minimum of rainfall. Such a grass he believes he has discovered in the Brome grass. It is not certain where this grass originated, but it is known that for the last thirty years it has been cultivated in Austria and Hungary and in the hot arid section of Southern Europe with a success that permits the strongest hopes of its successful introduction west of the Mississippi. Two years ago Asst Secretary Willits sent to Austria and secured a quantity of the seed of the brome grass, which was sown at the Garden City experiment station in Kansas. The result that year, which was a very dry one was beyond expectations. Last year twelve varieties of native grasses were sown alongside of the brome. Owing to the drought only two of these survived. The brome grass, grew luxuriantly and surpassed the two native grasses by a hundredfold.

Postmaster General Wannamaker is just now much interested in the street car letter box question. The subject is beset with difficulties., and many objections are advanced against the street car mail collection plan; but still it is felt necessary to improve upon present methods of mail collection and delivery in all the large cities of the country. Postmaster Harlow of St. Louis some time ago submitted a proposition to have letter boxes for collection placed on street cars, and a few days ago Postmaster Gentsch of Buffalo, New York, urged that the same plan be adopted in that city. Major Pollick of the Special Delivery Service in the Post office Department is examining the subject carefully. He thinks there are a number of weak points in the plan. One objection is that it is inadvisable to establish street car lines as Government Post roads, a privilege the Car Companies might be quick to take advantage of.

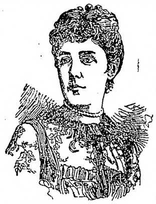
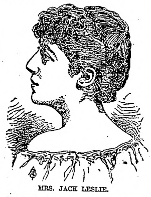
THE JEROME SISTERS.

All Five Married Well—One Is Lady Randolph Churchill.

Of all the girls in New York city the five Jerome sisters were considered the handsomest, and their father gave them every advantage that money could procure. They were as fond of horses as their father, and were in every way typical New York society girls of the most exclusive Four Hundred. They all made brilliant marriages, and one of them became Lady Randolph Churchill and went to London to live, where, after a long and bitter fight with the English nobility, she at last won an esteemed and respected position among them; but she bears in her face the lines born of long suffering, though a very handsome woman. Americans abroad are most grateful to her for her kindly offices in their behalf on many occasions.



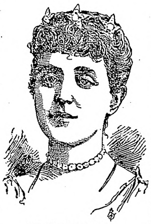
LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.



MRS. JACK LESLIE.

Another sister married Mr. Moreton Frewer, and she also is a handsome woman, with a close resemblance to her sisters. She lives in New York in winter and at Newport, Lenox or Saratoga in summer, or abroad visiting Lady Churchill when the latter is not here. She is also a belle in society, and is said to always have ready for instant wear 200 gowns. Her diamonds are exceedingly handsome, even among the diamonds worn in New York.

Mrs. Jack Leslie is another sister who also married rich and happily, and is a shining light among the great Four Hundred.



MRS. MORETON FREWER.

Mrs. Clarence Gray Dinsmore was a Jerome before her marriage to one of the sons of the late William B. Dinsmore, president of Adams Express company, and she, too, is possessed of her share of the family beauty, with a fine figure and very delicate complexion. golden hair and blue eyes. Her favorite jewels are pearls, and she as well as her sisters are all thorough ladies of distinguished family.

There was another sister who was married to J. Harry Alexander, and she died a few years ago, a very young bride. All of them married young.

PAN IN THE ORCHARD.

He carved a flute of elder green,
And notched it well and true,
Then pursed his lips and puffed his cheeks,
And merrily he blew.

For it was spring-time holiday,
A sun-tanned boy was he,
With russet freckles on his face
And a patch upon his knee.

The apple boughs above him flung
Their tangled sprays on high,
With one dark, bristling blue-jay nest
Rough-sketched against the sky.

He knew the secrets of the grass,
The burden of the hour,
He saw the fierce, bluff bumblebee,
Towse many a clover flower.

Orphaned and poor as poor could be,
The years before him lay
Dark billows of an unknown sea,
No lighthouse on the way.

And yet, and yet his elder flute
Could bring him comfort true:
He pursed his lips and puffed his cheeks
And blew, and blew! and blew!

A STORY OF SPECULATION.

Life on seven hundred and fifty a year, with a wife and family and a respectable position to keep up, is not all bliss, as Mr. William Driver, cashier to Messrs. Binder and Winder, drapers, discovered to his cost.

He had been united to Arabella, his helpmeet, just eight years, when he found this reflection almost insupportable. His existence, like that of Mr. Mantalini at the mangle, was one long "demnition grind"—at figures in the office to keep his books right, and figures at home to keep domestic matters square.

Binder and Winder were not the sort of people to stand any nonsense from their underlings. A hint from Driver to the effect that he would like his salary raised was met with the rejoinder that if he was dissatisfied he could give up his place, and he would find that hundreds were ready to jump into it.

The bare idea of getting out of a situation gave him the jumps, so he returned cowed to the mill, and ground away for another whole year—moody, dissatisfied, miserable.

He loved his wife and his children, too, and one of the great desires of his life was to see them well clothed and well fed.

He had always found it necessary to curb their longings in that direction, and now and then his wife would chafe under a refusal, which he could not avoid, to hand out the needful for sundry articles which fairly came under the head of necessaries.

"What can I do," he asked himself one morning, "to better my position?"

He asked himself this question as his eye was wandering mechanically over the front page of a daily paper. That eye lighted upon an advertisement which ran as follows:

TOM BOLTER AND CO.,

Now or never if you would make a fortune. Very little outlay and no risk.

On April 1st we heard of a good thing, and sent it to all our subscribers. "Cuddlemup Candle Company—shares down to fifteen to-day. Should be bought at once."

Address: Bolter and Co., Razor Alley. next to Workhouse Court.

"Two pounds in a hundred," mused William Driver, "it isn't much. Say I sent four pounds' worth of shares, and with a raise like that of the Cuddlemups I should be—oh! ever so much the better.

It was an unfortunate thing in one way that he had just received his salary for the month, and had it in his pocket.

Four pounds—it was a lot of money to him, but with no risk and certain profits—well something had to be done why not that?

So he sent four pounds and received an acknowledgment for same also an intimation that he had now an interest in the Argentine Switchback Railway Company, then on the point of starting, and considered a certain go.

He had a look at the paper, but could not see the Switchbacks quoted. Thereupon he communicated with Bolter and Co., who sent a post-card informing him that they expected to get them quoted in a day or two.

Several days passed, and Driver looked for signs of life in the company in vain. Meanwhile he received a communication from his brokers acquainting him with a prospective swift rise in Cockleton Tramcar Company shares, the daily receipt[sum not named] having been fully four times the amount estimated.

An investment of twenty pounds within a week would be as good as bagging two hundred.

"Twenty pounds!" gasped Driver. "What do they take me for?"

He brooded over it at the office, and made many blunders in his books. He dwelt on it at home by his fireside, while his wondering wife watched his reflective face, fearing each moment to hear him burst out with some disastrous news.

"Anything wrong at the office, dear?" she asked.

"No, no," he said. "I am only thinking of a way to better myself. I think, Bella we have brighter days in store for us."

Arabella was very glad to hear it, she also wanted to know in what direction to look for this. But on this point.

"It is a matter women do not understand," he said.

Arabella was huffed, but the prospect of a good time when money would flow more freely acted as a soothing medicine, and she let it go.

By and by he took up the paper and read another class of advertisement, finally dwelling on the following as the very thing to help him forward on the road to fortune:—

Money lent.—Gentleman requiring loans can have the same advanced on their note of hand. No inquiry. No security beyond a note of hand required. From £10 to £2,000.—Address by letter or call on Abraham Crutch, 49, Boodle Street, W.

Before going to bed he wrote to Abraham Crutch, and by the next evening a letter from that gentleman, requesting him to call, was awaiting his return.

Crutch simply wrote that he had better call. He would be at the office until eight o'clock on the morrow, having a lot of colonial loan business on hand.

Driver got away in time to call, and he found Crutch as gentle as a dove.

But before advancing the money he had a few questions to ask.

Did he owe any rent?—No.

How long had he been in his present situation?—Thirteen years; from boyhood, in fact.

"All right," said Crutch; "then just put your name to this piece of paper, and I'll write you a cheque."

Driver was overjoyed. He put his name to what appeared to be an ordinary acknowledgement of money received, and in return was handed a cheque for fourteen pounds.

"I asked for twenty," he said, feebly.

The fly had no moral courage to speak of and he caved in to the spider.

"After all," Driver argued to himself, as he hurried homeward, "I have fourteen pounds, and perhaps I can make up the other six in the morning."

He made it up—somehow—and, in sending off the twenty pounds to Bolter & Co., urged them to return at least half his profits without delay. A fortnight later William Driver left the office weary and sick at heart. He had, according to Bolter & Co, made some profit, which had been invested for him in a thing "almost sure," which, unhappily had not turned out trumps.

But they could make amends for one mishap by putting him on something better than all. They were not infallible, and did not profess to be. All they promised was success if their clients were persevering.

"How can I persevere?" he muttered. "There is only one way——"

He hurried on as if to fly away from some dreaded foe. Arriving home, he saw before he entered the house something was wrong.

Arabella was waiting him, heard his footsteps rushed out to meet him.

"Oh! Will, Will; a bailiff's in the house. What does it mean?

It simply meant that Mr. Crutch, holder of a bill of sale upon the furniture, had foreclosed, and unless he was paid forty pounds within twenty-four hours would clear out the house.

"So I signed a bill of sale?" groaned the poor devil. "But forty pounds!—how do you make that out?"

The man in possession did not make it out. He held his documents, and that was enough for him. Mr Crutch had kindly sent a letter to give the party time, not wishing to press him too closely. He would allow him until the next evening to get the money.

It's all right," said Driver to his wife. "It is all a mistake. I will put it right to-morrow."

"And is that horrid man to stay in the house till then?" asked Arabella.

"I am afraid so," groaned William.

The horrid man stayed, and in the morning, on his way to the office, Driver called upon a friend who held a good position in a first-class lawyer's office.

From him he learned that he would have to "pay the money or lose every stick he possessed." The innocent-looking piece of paper he had signed at Mr. Crutch's office was all-powerful.

"More fool he," you may say, but fools there have always been and always will be—with knaves to prey upon them. That night he brought home the money, paid the man out, and the next day went into further speculations under the guidance of Bolter and Co.

The summer passed, and winter came. Matters were all right at home—better, indeed, than they had ever been. William was restless at times, but always in the highest spirits. He gave Arabella good winter dresses, and came out with a fur-collared coat for himself. It was remarked by the neighbors that the Drivers were getting along in the world.

Arabella had never been so happy since her first child was born. There were four of them now, the eldest seven years of age—pretty children, sunshine to the house.

Occasionally Arabella went to meet William at the station, to walk home with him and tell him stories of the wonderful things the last baby had done during the day.

One evening she met him half way, but instead of going with her, to her great surprise, he stopped short.

"Arabella," he said, "I don't think I will come home just yet."

"Oh! Will, where are you going?" she asked with a downcast face. "I hope you are not getting into fast company."

"Not at all," he replied. "Go along, dear, and put the youngsters to bed. Kiss them for me."

He kissed her, although it was in a public thoroughfare, and hurrying off, was lost in the darkness, never in this world to be seen by her again.

What had happened that he should thus desert his wife and little ones whom he loved so fondly? The story is very simple.

He left the office at noon to get some luncheon, and, on returning a little before his time was up, found all the books in his charge had been taken away.

A garrulous junior told him that Binder and Windor, accompained by a stranger who "looked like an account," had taken the books, and were at that moment examining them in the private office of the firm.

Driver made no remark, but turning on his heel left the office. An hour or so later, it was whispered all over the place that he had been falsifying his books to cover the misappropriation of considerable sums of money of which he had robbed the firm.

It was the old story—a little taken at first as a loan "to be paid back when luck turned," but "luck" kept on its wrong course for him, and he followed it, getting deeper and deeper into the mire, increasing his "loans" as his losses multiplied, in the vain hope of being able to pull all things right in one grand coup.

The police were sent to his house that night, and as gently as they could told their errand. The shock to Arabella was tremendous.

"Oh! to see him again—to share his lot—whatever it might be! Woman-like she reproached herself with being the cause of it— for had she not been in the habit of grumbling at him about their miserable way of living? He had done it all for her.

Several days had passed and nothing was heard of him. It was assumed and openly asserted that he had gone abroad.

As time passed without any tidings of his arrest his hapless wife gathered hope. Surely he was safe in some far-off land, and would send for her by and by, so that they might toil together and pay back what he, in his miserable infatuation, had stolen. But he never sent for her.

About three weeks after he disappeared a battered corpse was found in the river near Blackwall.

It had been carried up and down by the tides, dragged along by passing ships, beaten by heavy barges. Only a few vestiges of clothing remained, and these were assumed to be some of the rags of a tramp's attire.

Such discoveries are not uncommon, and very little fuss was made over it.

Meanwhile, Bolter and Co. and Crutch thrive apace. They live in big houses and fare sumptuously every day. Let us all hope that the bread of their dishonest labors may one day choke them. The gallows on which Haman swung would not be half high enough for these leeches of society.

A Horse With A Moustache.

There may be seen in Cannon Street, at frequent intervals during the day, a horse that would make a comfortable living for its owner if placed on exhibition in a museum. Neither horse nor master, however, seems to be imbued with a desire for fame, and the former is content apparently to serve out his days at his alotted task of drawing a van about the City.

He is an ordinary-sized grey horse, with a most amiable cast of countenance, and with nothing remarkable about him except the possession of a large and well-shaped moustache. The later is kept carefully trimmed and brushed by the owner of the horse, but the possessor of this unusual appendage seems to pay but little attention to it. He has never been known, at least, to stroke it as men do, but by watching him closely it may be observed that he eyes it occasionally in a critical sort of a way.

He is six years old, and was born in France, but, so far as can be learned, he is the only member of his family who has ever been blest with either moustache or whiskers. On the contrary, his father's lip was without suspicion of a hair, and his mother, of course, was a stranger to such a thing.

"Benelt of Clergy."

This story of the late Dr. Edward Chapin, the Universalist minister, is told in a New York letter to the Philadelphia Press: Dr Chapin was smitten with a mortal disease and it was publicly announced in the newspapers. He had some heart trouble which did not prevent friends from seeing him, but it was known it would end his life in a brief time. He had been sick for some five weeks when one day the Rev. Dr. Armitage called. He was shown into Chapin's room and found the distinguished clergyman lying upon a sofa. When he saw Armitage he burst into tears, and Dr. Armitage was surprised. Chapin said: "Doctor, I can't help these tears, but they express gladness rather than sorrow. Do you know that you are the first clergyman of all those who have professed friendship for me who called to see me or even sent a message of sympathy to me in my illness. Not a single clergyman has been so considerate, and I tell you it has been a bitter sorrow to me at this time." Two days latter this great orator was dead.

A Wonderful Sense of Smell.

The buzzard's wonderful sense of smell is a curious subject that has been often discussed, the discussion having resulted in a general uniformity of opinion among scientists that they locate their food by their sense of smell alone. C. L. Hopkins the noted biologist, says that he noticed that in Florida they never leave the roots where the night is spent, especially on damp foggy mornings, until the moisture has been dried by the sun. They then move slowly across the wind until a "scent" is struck, when they move more slowly "up the wind" until the carrion is located. Sometimes they will drift down the wind past their prey, until they have struck the scent, which they follow up until they have found the object of their search, sometimes in the densest thickets. Mr. Hopkins says that he has upon several occasions killed wild hogs in the thickets, and, after dressing them and taking what meat he wished, would see twenty or more buzzards coming down with the wind. On one occasion they had discovered some animal remains he had covered up, and on another had found a dead snake which he had buried.

IS THE LOTTERY LAW VALID

A Cogent Argument Against Its Constitutionality—An Exhaustive, Learned and Logical

Presentation of the Case Against the Law—It is Argued That Congress Transcended Its Constitutional Powers in Passing It.

Honorable James C. Carter, the eminent jurist of New York city, has filed a very able, learned and interesting brief in the supreme court of the United States on the question of the constitutionality of the lottery law. Mr. Carter's client, George W. Dupre, was indicted Feb. 19, 1891, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, for mailing a newspaper containing an advertisement of a lottery, contrary to the provisions of section 3894 of Revised Statutes of the United States. He demurred to the indictment, and his demurrer was, upon argument, overruled, and he was ordered to plead thereto, and was thereupon surrendered by his bail and committed to the custody of the United States marshal to be held until discharged in due course of law.

He thereupon filed his petition in the supreme court praying for a habeas corpus and certiorari to the end that he might be discharged from his imprisonment. The ground of his petition is that the statute under which he was indicted is unconstitutional and void.

The provisions of the lottery law are so well known to the public that they do not need to be repeated here.

In his first point in presenting the case to the court, Mr. Carter defines the power of congress as limited in two ways: First, it can exercise no power which has not been conferred upon it by the constitution. Second, it cannot exercise the powers which have been thus bestowed in ways or for purposes which the constitution forbids.

His first proposition is that the statute in question (R. S., sec. 3894) is invalid, as being an attempt to exercise power not conferred upon congress.

In support of this proposition Mr. Carter says:

It is not denied that congress, in the exercise of the power conferred upon it by the constitution to establish postoffices, and post roads, is clothed with the full incidental power of regulating such offices and roads; in other words, mail service. Nor is it denied that this incidental power of regulation embraces the power of so limiting the carriage of matter by mail as to render that service practicable; and consequently embraces a power of excluding matter from the mails for that purpose and to that extent. What we do assert is that any incidental powers which congress may thus exercise must be such only as, in the

LANGUAGE OF THE CONSTITUTION,

"are necessary and proper" for carrying into execution a general power expressly conferred; and that whether any such incidental power is "necessary and proper" must be, as this court has always considered it, a judicial question.

The first form which the judicial inquiry assumes is whether the means employed by congress in executing its admitted powers are appropriate, and apparently conducive to the legitimate end. If they are so, it matters not whether or not they are the best and most effective means. Congress may fail in the effort to select these. But they must be means, in other words, they must have some relation to the end—some tendency to accomplish it. Applying this test, the statute in question is plainly invalid. This seems scarcely to admit of debate.

The legitimate end is to furnish mail facilities to the people of the United States; and this means to all the people of the United States. No argument will be expected from us to show that the power thus bestowed upon congress was not one to furnish mail facilities to such persons as congress might, from caprice or favor or any arbitrary motive, choose to grant them.

The attempt in 1836 to procure the enactment of a law to prevent the delivery from the postoffices of alleged incendiary publications on the subject of slavery called forth an earnest debate in the United States senate. Webster at once seized upon the essential vice of such legislation. He declared "that congress had not the power, drawn from the character of the paper, to decide whether it should be carried in the mail or not."

The same view was supported by Senators Davis of Massachusetts, Calhoun of South Carolina, Clay of Kentucky and others. There was no pretence made by any one participating in the debate that the measure was in any way conducive to the end of establishing a mail service.

Mr. Carter cites innumerable decisions of the court in support of his propositions, and then goes on to say that no one will assert that congress has power to suppress lotteries any more than it has to suppress any other employment or pursuit. If congress had enacted a law directly forbidding under penalties the carrying on of the lottery business in any state, there would be no hesitation in any court in declaring it to be unconstitutional.

Inasmuch as a denial of mail facilities to persons wishing to carry on any particular pursuit must, of necessity, so far impede it as to greatly abridge the extent to which it may be carried on, and in many instances render it impossible, and as the argument under notice asserts the absolute right of congress, in its uncontrollable discretion, to refuse the facilities in any case (and such was Mr. Buchanan's view), it involves the assertion that congress has the right, by such action, to break up or impede any business or employment.

What power did Congress really exercise when enacting this exclusion? Not certainly a power of regulating the mail service in order to make that service practicable, convenient and efficient.

The real power which congress attempted to exercise was to hamper and impede, and, if possible, to destroy the lottery business, in order to protect the people of the United States from the assumed demoralizing and dangerous tendencies of lotteries. Inasmuch as no one pretends that congress may pass a law directly suppressing lotteries on the ground that they have an immoral tendency, or, indeed, on any ground whatever, the question is whether it can pass a law, not directly suppressing them by declaring them to be crimes, but harassing and obstructing them by withdrawing from them facilities which are under its control, for no other reason than that it deems them crimes which it would suppress it it had the power.

This question must be promptly answered in the negative, for the power thus attempted to be exercised is a power to suppress lotteries and that alone. No such power can be derived from any express language in the constitution, nor by any just implication from any language in it. More than this, the possession of any such power by congress is utterly inconsistent with the whole theory of the between the general government and the states.

Nothing is clearer than that the carrying on of a lottery, or the dealing in the lottery business, or with a lottery, is, in every instance, an act done within a state, and the power to declare such acts crimes, or to punish them as such, or to obstruct or impede them because they are crimes, is lodged exclusively with the state governments. They possessed this power before the adoption of the constitution. They did not part with it by that adoption. Indeed, nothing was more sedulously guarded against by that instrument than the notion that the states had parted with any of their governmental rights over the conduct of their own citizens upon their own soil, except in respect to such concerns as were expressly intrusted to the federal government.

In respect to all rights other than those thus excepted, that government was to be as absolutely powerless as if it were a foreign state. To borrow the language of Mr. Chief Justice Waite in the United States vs. Cruikshank (92 U. S. 542, 550): "Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme above the states; but beyond, it has no existence."

Whether a citizen of Louisiana, or of Maine, may carry on the lottery business, or do any act in the transaction of any business with a lottery, must there ore depend on the laws of those states respectively.

DIRECT LEGISLATION OF A STATE.

If congress may disfavor one occupation or business by withdrawing from it the benefit of the mails, it may another. Should those who favor the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks obtain a majority in the national councils—and, perhaps, that is now within their power—they may forbid the carriage of mail matter relating to that business. And what limit could be set by this court to such an assumption of authority?

But the statute in question is invalid, not only for the reason that none of the powers conferred upon congress were sufficient to authorize it, but also because congress was by an express restriction upon the exercise of those powers, prohibited from making such a law. It is a law "abridging the freedom of the press" within the meaning of the first amendment.

At this point Mr. Carter reviewed at length the history of English jurisprudence on the liberty of the press, explaining its evolution from the period when it was in utter subjection to the state through its various trials and vicissitudes until it reached a condition of unquestioned freedom. He then took up the inquiry as to whether the statute under consideration is a law abridging that freedom. That such is its character is very clear, he said.

That freedom, he continued, includes not only the liberty of printing but the liberty of publishing. The former would be empty, indeed, without the latter. And the liberty of publishing must be co-extensive with the liberty of printing. And what is publishing? It is the communication to others of what is printed; in other words, it is circulating. Publishing and circulating are admitted to be synonymous. And what was the liberty of publishing which existed at the time of the adoption of the constitution? It was the liberty of circulating printed matter in all practicable and permissible forms, of which that by mail was by far the principal mode. It included letters, newspapers and packets.

The statute forbids the carriage by mail of any newspaper, circular, pamphlet or publication of any kind containing matter concerning, it may be, a thousand subjects, if it also contains any "advertisement of any lottery or gift enterprise of any kind offering prizes dependent upon any lot or chance or containing any list of the prizes awarded at the drawings of any such lottery or gift enterprise." Thus, no man can circulate a newspaper in any state except upon condition that he consents to forego the benefit to be derived from any such advertisement, although in such state. Of course the conditions may, if this be allowed, be extended to any other advertisement relating to any business or subject; and thus the power is directly asserted by this legislation of congress to control the character of the whole newspaper press; for no one will pretend that the publication of newspapers is possible, on any large scale, if the benefit of the mail service is denied to them. If this power exists, what stands in the way of excluding newspapers which contain matters advocating the tariff or free trade, or the doctrines, or the candidates of a particular party?

And still further: The statute creates a censorship. Had it forbidden only the depositing in the mail of the matter described, it might be urged that every one was at liberty to make such deposit, subject to the hazard of being indicted and punished, and, therefore, that there was no previous restraint. But the prohibition forbids the postmaster from delivering any such newspaper, circular, pamphlet or publication. It arrests publication, for it arrests the communication of the matter to the public, or to those for whom it is intended. And whether publication should be thus arrested is submitted to the judgment of a postmaster! This is a perfect restoration of the censorship. That, indeed, as formerly existing, was interposed a stage earlier. It forbade the printing until the imprimatur was given. But this is interposed before publication, which is the essence of the censorship. It is previous restraint. The withholding of the tradatur of the postmaster is as effective as the withholding of the imprimatur of the censor.

One learned judge, startled by the sweeping scope of the language, which as clearly embraces the mailing of the prohibited matter to lottery dealers as by lottery dealers, has declared it incredible that congress could have intended to punish a man for a criminal offense who had simply written a letter to a lottery dealer, even if it were to order a ticket, and has cut down the statute so as to limit its prohibitions to lottery dealers. (United States vs. Clark, 22 Federal Reports, 708.) It a statute embraces provisions, some of which are within and some beyond the legislative power, the former may be saved if they can be read separately from the latter; but the separation cannot be effected by a heroic construction. Courts must untie knots, not cut them. "It would certainly be dangerous if the legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders, and leave it to the courts to step inside and say who could rightfully be detained and who should be set at large. This would, to some extent, substitute the judicial for the legislative department of the government." (United States vs. Reese, 92 U. S., 214. 221.)

CONGRESS HAD NO DIRECT POWER WHATEVER.

That congress has power to exclude from the mail any publication or letter tending to promote murder, arson, burglary, larceny—anything which is malum in se—or anything which tends to facilitate the commission of acts which it has power under the constitution to declare to be crimes and punish as such—piracy, and counterfeiting the coin, for instance, is not questioned.

Hence it has the power to forbid the mailing or delivery of obscene books or pictures. The publication or circulation of these was a perfectly well known offense to common law.

There are, as there were at the time of the adoption of the constitution, two methods by which printed matter might be circulated; one public and the other private.

The former was the principal one upon which the whole public mainly relied. It was constant, regular, abundant and sure; and, moreover, it had the capacity by law of excluding the other from the field, if not absolutely, at least for the most part, and of thus increasing its own efficiency. There was, and is, a similar, if not as great, difference between the methods as between the sending of merchandise by railroad and by private conveyance. This principal method of circulation is denied to certain printed matter, and yet it is declared that the freedom of circulation is not abridged!

It is quite evident that this conclusion proceeds upon the view—it can stand upon no other—that the freedom of circulating, admitted to be tantamount to freedom of publishing, is not abridged so long as the citizen has the right to circulate printed matter in any private manner which he alone, or with the assistance of others, may contrive, and has reference only to the right to circulate, and no reference to any right to enjoy the usual public means of circulating which his fellow citizens enjoy, and for which he is taxed and made to pay in common with them.

Against this view it seems to us more in accordance with sense and reason to say that the emphatic declaration of the constitution made to forever preserve the that congress should not pass any law abridging the freedom of the press, is violated by any law which takes away any of the ordinary methods of circulating printed matter.

There are two principal questions in this case, and none more important have ever been submitted to this tribunal. The first is whether congress may, in virtue of its authority to make laws necessary and proper in order to carry into execution the powers expressly granted to it, pass a law manifestly and avowedly for the sole purpose of suppressing a business within a state, which that state has the right to authorize, and over which congress has no direct control. The second is whether a law prohibiting the circulation of certain written and printed matter open to no objection save that it relates to a certain business not criminal in itself, and permitted by the laws of some of the states, by the ordinary and usual means of circulation provided by law for the public generally, abridges the freedom of circulation, and, by consequence, the freedom of the press.—[Boston (Mass.) A TERRIBLE MOMENT.

It was in India. Dinner was just finished in the messroom, and several English officers were sitting about the table. The bronzed faces had the set but not unkindly look common among military men. The conversation, at best, had not been animated, and just now there was a lull, as the night was too hot for small talk. The major of the regiment, a clean-cut man of 55, turned toward his next neighbor at the table, a young subaltern, who was leaning back in his chair with his hands clasped behind his head, staring through the cigar smoke at the ceiling. The major was slowly looking the man over, from his handsome face down, when, with sudden alertness, and in a quiet, steady voice, he said:

"Don't move, please, Mr. Carruthers, I want to try an experiment with you. Don't move a muscle."

"All right, Major," replied the subaltern, without even turning his eyes. "Hadn't the least idea of moving, I assure you. What's the game?"

By this time all the others were listening in a lazily expectant way.

"Do you think," continued the Major, and his voice trembled just a little, "Do you think you can keep absolutely still for, say, two minutes—to save your life?"

"Are you joking?"

"On the contrary move a muscle and you are a dead man. Can you stand the strain?"

"Burke," said the Major, addressing an officer across the table, "pour some of that milk into a saucer, and set it on the floor here just back of me. Gently, man! Quiet!

Not a word was spoken as the officer quietly filled the saucer, walked with it carefully around the table, and set it down where the Major had indicated on the floor.

Like a marble statue sat the young subaltern in his white linen clothes, while a cobra di capelle, which had been crawling up the leg of his trousers, slowly raised its head, then turned, descended to the floor, and glided towards the milk.

Suddenly the silence was broken by the report of the Major's revolver, and the snake lay dead on the floor.

"Thank you Major," said the subaltern, as the two men shook hands warmly. "You have saved my life."

"You're welcome, my boy," replied the senior. "But you did your share."

Red Tape In the West.

A Navajo pupil at Teller Institute was found to have one of his feet endowed with a surplus toe, and the superintendent ordered a pair of shoes for him from a local shop, at a cost of $5. Secretary Noble disputed the bill. Then the superintendent wrote to the Secretary: "Indian boy here with six toes; can't possibly wear Government shoes. What shall I do? The Secretary answered: "Off with his toe.' Next the superintendent asked; 'Which toe?" And the Secretary wrote: Sixth toe, of course." If the Secretary thought that that ended it he was wrong. Again the superintendent adressed him, saying: "Toe off. What shall I do with it?" To which the Secretary made final answer; "Ship it to Topeka for interment in Government graveyard."—Denver Junction News.

FARM FIELD AND GARDEN.

INTERESTING MATTERS FOR AGRICULTURAL READERS.

Uneasy Farmers--How to Form a Perfect Hedge--To Subdue Weeds--To Wool Growers --About Onions--Hints to the Farmer.

Uneasy Farmers.

No wonder there are many uneasy farmers, says Geo. A. Stockwell, Rhode Island, in the American Agriculturalist. The times are mending a little, but they have been hard, and methods and opportunities of advancement have changed. Those acquainted with the circumstances must sympathize and even applaud the farmer in his discontent, for discontent of the right kind, well-founded, may be the stepping stone to something better. When the farm yields only a bare living and taxes, then the farmer is dissatisfied, and he has cause, for no man of spirit in this age of the world is contented with a living. In this fact is found one clue to the abandonment of a large number of farms in Maine and Vermont. But it must be admitted that it is a serious matter to quarrel with a "dead sure" living, scant as it may be. Discontent leads to restlessness, and to unwise forsaking of what is in hand. Every year in some, if not in many, parts of the east, the "western fever" rages and claims its victims. Hasty migrations have been made to some supposed land of promise in the west, and the result in many cases was disastrous.

Standing upon the rolling prairie, the richest land of this continent, where the prairie rolled on to a high hill, the writer has had pointed out to him 12 abandoned farms, and he has also seen on this prairie land more poverty, discontent, discomfort than can be found in an agricultural area of the same extent in New England, or any part of the east. It could not be worse anywhere. But the prairie was not to blame. It was the result of unwise emigration. Perhaps the settlers were deceived; at all events they found the conditions different, foreign to their ideas and methods, and disappointed, broken, gave up. This fact cannot be disputed, namely, that a living on a New England farm, poor as it may be is much more than a mere living to the same man on the prairie, unless he has capital to help him; and a bare living on the prairie, obtained from the prairie, is the nearest to nothing that ever man had to contend with. The prairie buds and blossoms like a garden, but not without help. Therefore, let every farmer who can command a living, scant though it may be, cling to it, think twice a hundred times before he abandons it.

How to Form a Perfect Hedge.

To have a hedge do its best, whether deciduous or evergreen, it should be pruned twice a season. The first pruning should be done before growth has stopped, the second about the close of summer, after the length of growth has been completed for the season. On the method Joseph Meehan writes as follows in Practical Farmer: A hedge to be perfect must be broader at the base than at any other part. Summer pruning, that is, the first one, is mainly to thicken the hedge and stengthen the base. To do this, the top and most of the upper branches are clipped off then, while the lower ones are touched but little in an old hedge, and not at all in a young one in which the shape has not been well formed. As soon as the tops are cut away the sap flows to those remaining, greatly invigorating them. In old hedges where shape and bushiness have already been attained, the whole of the hedge may be trimmed back to thicken it, but let the severest cutting be at the top. For every branch cut off half a dozen new ones form, so that in time the hedge becomes so dense that a bird can hardly fly through it. After the first cutting there will be more growth made, and this is allowed to grow on as long as it will. When all growth has stopped, which will be in September in the middle states, the hedge is gone over again, and cut clean into a good shape, which should neither be too round nor too pointed. In connection with this it may be said here that single trees should be pruned in the same way the hedge is. Bushiness comes from stopping the leading shoots before they are done growing. Pruning in winter acts the other way, encouraging an extra strong top growth.

To Subdue Weeds.

One important point in keeping a farm clear from weeds is to see that these germs are not imported in purchased seeds. Weeds are often introduced by the farmer's own animals. Horses that have been fed at the town stables and cattle that have been allowed to forage on the highways, may each be the means of bringing obnoxious weeds onto the farm. For the hoed crops clean cultivation is the antidote. Cut the weeds off at the surface of the ground at a time when they are at their best—that is when they are flowering, and before the seed has grown sufficient to germinate. This is the best method of dealing with seeds after they have become a pest in meadows and pastures. In the latter sheep are very efficient weed destroyers, as they will browse closely many varieties that cattle will not touch. In some countries it is said that there are fields entirely free from weeds, owing to very high cultivation and careful selection of seeds and manures. Such results are not to be expected in this country, and we shall continue to have weeds as heretofore, but they can be kept in such subjection as to reduce their injurious effects to a minimum. Where they serve no better use, they at least give evidence of the soil's fertility. Unless rich ground is closely covered with useful plants it is quite certain to produce weeds. Nothing surpasses clover for smothering weeds, if sown thickly, and stock is kept off from it after the mowing, so that some of the seed from the second crop will be scattered, it will gain complete possession of the field to the exclusion of the weeds.—New York World.

To Wool Growers.

It is a well known fact that wool buyers annually sustain more or less loss on their purchases, owing to the improper handling of wool by growers. It is claimed that after a season like the past, when final results have not been satisfactory, buyers, when entering the new clip will do so prepared to use unusual discretion in making their selections; and that the best results may be realized and the trade started on a satisfactory basis the following suggestions to sheep growers are recommended:

The sheep should be housed during storms, regularly fed and watered, the weak ones especially cared for, the short stapled ones marked at shearing time, fattened and sold. They should be kept from plowed ground, burrs, wild oats, chaff, and be well tagged before shearing, so that in time the entire flock would grow long, strong and most valuable wool at all times and in all markets. Each fleece should be tied by itself, inside out, with two strings each way and with regular wool twine. Wool never looks as well nor weighs as much as when first taken off the sheep, when it should be put on to the market and its best price realized. In shipping, mark a number and the weight on each sack and send a list of them. This will help to trace any errors or losses in case any should occur.—American Cultivator.

About Onions.

The growing of onion sets is often a very profitable branch of gardening, and may be pursued with equal success on either a large or small scale, as they can always be marketed readily in any quantity. There are two ways in which the sets may be produced, and two distinct kinds of onions are used in the process. One is from seeds of ordinary kinds of onions sown very thick, causing them to crowd each other and mature early. This is assisted by pulling up the young plants, laying them on the ground so that the top or green part will die away, and thus leaving a small perfect onion, such as is used for pickling, These small bulbs, if planted again the following spring, will grow on and form onions just as if raised from the seed. A large portion of onion sets, however, is the product of the "top" or "tree onion." The onion has the singular property of producing at the top of its flower stalk, instead of seed, a mass of small onions that are saved and used for sets. This sort is hardy enough to stand out of doors all winter, and is the kind mostly used by market gardeners for young green onions in the spring. This is seldom used for the main crop, as it does not form so perfect a bulb as the other.—Seed and Harvest Time.

Dairy Cleanliness.

The subject of dairy cleanliness is a most comprehensive one and goes way back to the nature of the food and drink taken into the stomach of the cows. No matter how careful in all subsequent processes, if you allow the cow to pasture at the manure pile and to drink from barn-yard pools, you will not make pure, clean butter. Purity of food and water are strictly essential, and so is the bodily cleanliness of the cows. See to it that they have plenty of clean, fresh bedding.

Profit In Dairying.

A New York dairyman says that with cows which will produce 300 pounds of butter per year he can find a satisfactory profit in the business with butter at 20 cents a pound. As it is not difficult to contract the product of good dairies at an annual figure in excess of this, it would appear that there is yet money in at least one branch of farming.

Hints for the Farmer.

Strawberry plants require plenty of fertilizing.

After the eighth year the milk yield of a cow rapidly decreases in flow.

Move quietly among your chickens, they are a timid set and do not admire boisterous company.

Whitewash now every two weeks, it will keep houses, run and roosts clean and free from vermin.

Young chickens less than four weeks old should not be allowed to run in the grass in the morning until after the sun has dried it.

In disposing of eggs in market separate the kinds, as they appear more uniform and attract quicker than if all sizes and shades are mixed up.

When cucumbers are planted place some brush near the hills, so that the vines can climb on the brush for support. In this manner the young cucumbers intended for pickling can be more easily picked.

It helps the grass crop, blue grass or timothy, to harrow the fields every spring, and loosen the surface of the sods. The grass roots take a deeper hold and the herbage flourishes accordingly. Besides harrowing breaks up and spreads the droppings of animals left during the winter.

SHE'S A PERSON THEY ALL LOVE.

The Kind of a Girl That Men Admire and Want to Marry.

In glancing over the columns of a newspaper recently my attention was caught by an article in which a lady discussed the attractive qualities of marriageable girls in the eyes of eligible men.

If my understanding of the writer's conclusions is correct the inference may be drawn that, as there are all kinds of girls and all kinds of men, almost any kind of a girl will please some kind of a man, observation undoubtedly justifying such an opinion.

There is however, one girl—every man knows which one I mean—whose versatility and adabtability render her particularly agreeable.

She is always frank and free in conversation, even on unconventional subjects, but she is never bold and will tolerate nothing approaching coarseness.

You are positive that her seeming interest in the matters which interest you is not entirely assumed, and you are conscious also that she knows whether your affected desire to understand the affairs occupying her attention is genuine.

There is no indication either when you are present that she ever thinks of you when absent to any greater degree or in any other way than your male acquaintances do.

If you desire to air your stock of complimentary nothings she can handle them more gracefully than that other girl with whom you can talk nothing else, and there is delightfully missing all sensation of having them extorted from you.

Perhaps in a momentarily cynical mood you sit down to reflect on this girl's charm, determined to discover whether it is the result of ingenuous naturalness or the most consummate art. What is your conclusion? H-m-m, yes; but one thing is certain—the charm is there, isn't it?

Now, to be honest, doesn't it lie in the fact that she apparently receives just that impression of your character and personality which you know, in the depths of your consciousness, is a little too favorable for uninflated truth, yet is not so absurdly flattering but that you can honestly endeavor to believe it correct.

This girl, who meets on level ground every man worth meeting, though not challenging admiration, usually takes her choice among several suitors; and if that man is sensible enough to treat her after marriage as he did before he seldom regrets the choice.

Any disappointment she may feel is never publicly admitted.

DIFFERENCE IN GOLD.

Experts Can Tell Where a Piece Comes From by the Color.

"Most people suppose," says an assayer in the New York Tribune. "that all gold is alike when refined, but this is not the case. An experienced man can tell at a glance from what part of the world a gold piece comes from and in some cases from what part of a particular gold district the metal was obtained. The Australian gold, for instance, is distinctly redder than the California, and this difference in color is always perceptible, even when the gold is 1,000 fine. Again, the gold obtained from the placers is yellower than that which is taken directly from quartz. Why this should be the case is one of the mysteries of metallurgy, for the placer gold all comes from the veins. The Ural gold is the reddest found anywhere. Few people know the real color of gold, as it is seldom seen unless heavily alloyed, which renders it redder than when pure. The purest coins ever made were the $50 pieces that used to be common in California. Their coinage was abandoned for two reasons—first, because the loss by abrasion was so great, and secondly, because the interior would be bored out and lead substituted, the difference in weight being too small to be readily noticed in so large a piece. These octagonal coins were the most valuable ever struck."

A New Profession.

Weddings have become such laborious and public ceremonies that a certain ambitious letter carrier of Brooklyn, whom the New York Recorder knows, has made for himself "a new and profitable occupation as major domo of these functions. The principle of his success is that a family seldom has the opportunity to become familiar from actual experience with the mechanical details of losing one of its members. The routine is always the same, and it is very convenient to have some clear headed man behind the scenes, who orders flowers and refreshments in proper quantity, times the entrance and exit of principals and guests, pays the clergyman, organist, liveryman, and others; instructs ushers and waiters, watches the wedding gifts, and, if needs be, maps out the bridal tour. This enterprising letter carrier is making more money as an auxiliary of Cupid than as a disciple of Mercury."

Manufactured Honey

It has long been known that much of our American honey in the market is not the produce of the bee, but manufactured by a secret process from a glucose made from maize. H. Hager the German chemist, has been experimenting in this direction, and finds that, by treating wheat or maize, not potato, starch with oxalic or other powerful organic acid, a syrup is produced which, in a certain concentration, and after standing two or three weeks, exactly resembles old honey in taste and appearance.

"More Circulation!"

Is a cry that has frequently been heard in the newspapers and on the stump recently. Money is a very powerful affair, but it is not as important as health. Men who lack health are willing to give a good deal of money for a stronger and purer circulation of the blood; and yet not much money is required to secure this ground work and basis of vitality. To the weak, the feeble and the debilitated Swift's Specific SSS insures a plentiful circulation of rich and pure blood. This means, of course, that this powerful vegetable remedy destroys the germs and drives out the seeds of disease. Wherever the blood is to be purified and the system built up it may be depended on to do the work promptly and effectually. Mr. John O. Rogers, of Dana, Illinois, says: "My wife was for years an invalid from a blood trouble, and suffered terribly at times from erysipelas. A few bottles of SSS cured her. She considers it the best blood purifier and tonic she ever saw."

IT'S CHEAP BUT LIVELY.

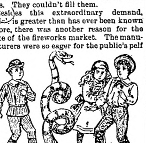
THE FIRECRACKER COSTS NO MORE THIS YEAR THAN LAST.

All Other Patriotic Explosives, However, Have Advanced in Price—Some of the Novelties Appropriate to the Season of Celebration.

[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

PEOPLE who are fond of worrying over the decay of American patriotism can draw whole volumes of consolation just now by interviewing the nearest fireworks manufacturer. If they can induce him to be at all sociable they will learn that never before in the history of America has there been such an overwhelming quantity of this same patriotism—that is if patriotism can be measured by a desire to celebrate the glorious Fourth. Every fireworks factory in the land ran night and day for several months, hundreds of extra hands were pressed into service and everybody connected with the trade worked double time in the effort to keep up with the orders that poured in. Facilities were pushed as they were never pushed before, and every known device to increase the output was adopted, but all in vain. The demand kept steadily in advance of the supply until the market was practically cleaned up, and manufacturers as well as wholesalers refused to receive any more orders. They couldn't fill them.

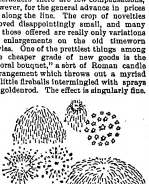
Besides this extraordinary demand, which is greater than has ever been known before, there was another reason for the state of the fireworks market. The manufacturers were so eager for the public's pelf that they crippled themselves. In the hope that a gigantic trust would be formed they put off making stock until the last moment, and then with the increased demand they were practically paralyzed. A number of the largest manufacturers succeeded in forming a combination, but so many big houses refused to come in that the trust idea failed entirely, and the fireworks people instead of benefiting themselves, sustained positive damage in that they lost all the orders which they were unable to fill. At the same time the public suffered too, for with the excessive demand the prices for fireworks went up from 25 to 50 per cent.



THE SNAKE'S NEST.

Only one thing escaped this increase—the firecracker. With fine discrimination the powers which rule all these things saw to it most carefully that in the general squeeze the interests of the small boy should remain secure. Thanks to the unlimited supply of crackers in China, no combination or threatened combination was able to force up the price or cut down the available quantity. Not even the increased duty recently put on fireworks by act of congress affects the American boy's interests. The forty cents a box additional levied by Uncle Sam comes out of the pockets of the importers and wholesalers. The retailers got the crackers as cheaply as they did last year, and the young people should be able to buy all they can possibly pay for at the old price. No one knows just how many crackers were received for this year's trade, but there were more than enough to go around and leave a lot to spare for next year. In fact there is almost a glut.

Outside of this bountiful supply of cheap firecrackers there are few compensations, however, for the general advance in prices all along the line. The crop of novelties proved disappointingly small, and many of those offered are really only variations or enlargements on the old timeworn styles. One of the prettiest things among the cheaper grade of new goods is the "floral bouquet," a sort of Roman candle arrangement which throws out a myriad of little fireballs intermingled with sprays of goldenrod. The effect is singularly fine.



EXPLODING A BOMBSHELL.
1. Sectional view. 2. Firing. 3. The result.

What was formerly known as the "flower pot" becomes a "miniature battery" this year, the change being wrought by adding shooting stars, exploding bombs and other detonating matter to the collection of flower effects.

"Dragon nests" are also improvements on this line, though they are much larger and more expensive. The exhibition begins with discharges of stars, which, as they ascend, separate into a shower of smaller stars. At the same time there is a steady rain of colored fire, which finally gives place to a great flock of dragons, which soar into the air with a loud, hissing noise. In their flight these dragons leave behind them big trails of fire, and finally these go out with a sharp explosion. The show lasts perhaps three or four minutes, and costs $2.50 for each nest.

Another "nest," though of an entirely different kind, brings forth a snake, which is lifelike and squirms enough to throw a drinking man into fits. It is harmless looking until a match is touched to the end of the arrangement which holds the "nest." Then there gradually begins a writhing and wriggling, until suddenly the snake, stripes and all, begins to coil upward with a hissing noise, as though it was preparing to strike. But, outside of this sop which is thrown to the snakes, the favorite subject matter with the fireworks inventors is still the dragon. It figures as the principal attraction in nearly all the large pieces.

In the "whistling jack," which is set on the ground and sends forth all sorts of possible and impossible creations, the dragon is particularly numerous. It comes forth amid a fine burst of red and green fire, and for several minutes swarms in the air above the "whistling jack" as thick as mosquitoes at the seacoast.

For $1.50 a very unique display is given in the "revolving tulip." It is suspended from a long string, and as soon as it is touched off begins to revolve, displaying a large tulip shaped flower, with flaming red leaves. During the five minutes that it lasts the effect is very pretty.

In bombshells and torpedoes the manufacturers did unusually well in comparison with former years. For comparatively little money one might have a series of explosions right at the front door beside which ordinary artillery would seem a weak and childlike thing. In case noise isn't the only end aimed at, a new shell has been put on the general market which, besides going off with a deafening noise, will explode in midair, giving forth any one of a dozen pictures.

But it is in the big "set pieces" that the greatest selection has been offered. People willing to pay from $20 to $150 might have almost anything reproduced in sputtering fire, from their grandfather's favorite motto to the eagle which is proud to take the land of Jonathan under its paternal wing. The call for these pieces has been, in consequence, something unheard of. Balloon displays, too, are also unusually numerous and interesting. For months past immense quantities of grotesque figure balloons have been imported from Japan, and in addition the domestic factories have turned out as many more.

The Japs have apparently outdone themselves in striving after novelty, their favorite forms being queer shaped heads, which, when inflated with hot air, make a most imposing showing, provided they will consent to go up, which is by no means always the case. In fact, unless they are handled with particular skill, none of these figure arrangements will prove satisfactory, and people who want to make certain of seeing their balloons in the air had better hereafter stick to the plain, old fashioned kind made of ordinary tissue paper. These can be bought very cheaply of any desired size, or they can be made at home.

Where the display is to be at all large it will pay to inflate the balloons first before sending them up with the usual piece of flaming cotton saturated in alcohol. This inflating can be done very easily and thoroughly by taking a little stove into the open air and fastening a short length of pipe over it. A brisk fire of oil soaked rags will send a good volume of heat up through the stovepipe, over the end of which the mouth of the balloon is held until it is fully inflated. Then, if the burning cotton is fastened beneath as usual, the balloon will sail twice as well as ordinarily. In case no stove is available any old tin box or big oil can, with a hole cut in the top for the stovepipe, will serve as well. The improved results achieved will repay all the extra trouble, as by means of this inflating process a display can be had beside which all the so called "daylight fireworks" will be nowhere.

It is somewhat surprising to reckon among the journalists and writers of the country the proportion of men who have failed in other kinds of business, and who took to the shoving of a pen with feelings that must have been somewhat akin to despair. This side of the story, however, has been talked and written about until it is no longer fresh enough to take for a subject. Who has ever thought about the other side? Who ever counted up the number of men who fail in literature and are driven to do other things? There is a large proportion of them among successful business men. What, for instance, would have become of Jay Gould if he had had pluck enough to continue writing county histories? He might have become famous, but who would venture to say that he could have made so comfortable a provision for his old age? So with Alfred Sully, the western railroad president—the man who came so near buying up the Baltimore and Ohio when Garrett was first ready to let it slip through his fingers. Sully gave a $50,000 dowry to his favorite niece when she married, but he could hardly have done that if he had stuck to his first notions about the career to which he was destined, and had continued to write and publish books of poetry.

Austin Corbin, the man who started Sully (as he has started many another man) on the high road to prosperity, has been able by frugality and patience to lay aside enough of his wages to live comfortably, but he didn't do it until he had given up the writing of novels, to which he first devoted his energies. His first and only novel was published in 1847, and it is not remembered against him. He lives very comfortably now.

A Royal Marriage in Prospect.

Alexander, the boy king of Servia, stands in such a peculiarly lonely position, without a relative at hand, that the regents are anxious for him to form family ties as soon as possible. They have planned a marriage for him with Princess Xenia of Montenegro, sixth daughter of Prince Nicholas, and should the negotiations succeed, the princess will visit Belgrade to be betrothed to the king on his fifteenth birthday. As, however, the princess is only ten years old the betrothal would not be made public for some time. This alliance would be important from a political point of view, as Prince Nicholas has long hankered after the Servian throne.

The verdict of the twelve good men and true as the Crookston Journal calls them who did not know the meaning of the word justification—but who brought in a verdict of $1,000 against the NEWS a year ago has been reversed by the supreme court. The verdict was not given in accordance with the evidence, but sympathy for the forlorn expression of the plaintiff was one cause of bringing in the above verdict. The supreme court looks at the evidence in a different light and has now reversed the judgment. When the time comes when the courts of this free country will cause the press to pay a penalty for telling the truth we will see the supremacy of the law trampled under foot and sovereign rights yield to naught but greater force. The NEWS was confident it had printed nothing libelous and the proprietors were not the least doubtful as to the result. We are on deck and prospering and ready for another battle.

The Crookston Times, rather indignent at our article in last weeks issue, when we exposed the scheme of Crookston to bond Polk County for $220,000 in aid of a Rail Road to be built to Crookston, says the NEWS never loses an apportunity to say something mean or deterimental about Crookston and in favor of Grand Forks. It then adds "Its a dirty bird that befouls its own nest." If the assertion that Crookston is our nest could be substantiated we would not object to the fulfillment of the balance of the quotation. We do not know any particular reason why the readers of the NEWS or this paper should say anything in praise of Crookston. It has been sapping the life blood out of not only the people of Red Lake Falls but of a large portion of the county, since the county of Polk was organized. It every paper in the county would remain mum and let the Crookston schemers fulfill their aims where would the taxpayers be in a few years? To incur the enmity of Crookston 'tis only necessary to expose some of its acts whereby it would build itself up at the expense of the balance of the county. We owe Crookston nothing; upon the other hand its prosperity is due to the territory which is tributary to it. There is one thing certain, Crookston will never succeed in bonding Polk county to the extent of $220,000 for the sake of adding perhaps 100 people to its population by advent of the Duluth & Winnipeg rail road. We shall ever be found befouling our nest (Crookston) when they try to burden the people down with taxes.

CUPID HAS CLAIMED HER.

Recent Marriage of a Bright Newspaper Woman of Chicago.

Among the journalistic workers of Chicago no woman in the past seven years has risen to higher prominence than Mrs. Katherine Prindiville. Her marriage, which has just taken place in London, therefore deprives the press of that city of an unusually bright and efficient member.

MRS. KATHERINE PRINDIVILLE.

The gentleman in whose interest she has terminated her journalistic career is Dr. J. Edwin Harris, a dentist established in London.

Dr. Harris belongs to one of the best families of Maryland, and is the son of Dr. J. H. Harris, president of the university of that state. Mrs. Prindiville is regarded as an excellent art critic. She has held positions on the Chicago Herald, Times, Saturday Evening Herald, and Tribune. Her womanliness and reliability combined to win for her universal respect and to make her of value as a writer. She also has acted as a foreign correspondent with credit to herself. She has been a leader in dress reform for women, but is opposed to sacrificing any of the adornments which are essentially feminine.

Mrs. Prindiville has been a widow several years, her immediate family consisting of an only daughter. She is very handsome, possessing a delicate type of beauty. She is on the sunny side of thirty, and her crown of prematurely white hair, combined with a fair and youthful face, conveys a peculiarly contradictory and time defying impression.

She was educated in Detroit, and as Miss Ryan was one of the belles of that city until she became the wife of John Prindiville, Jr., of Chicago. She is also popular in the literary and professional circles of London.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

We will probably have a race track before fall.

Real Estate agent Gewein was in Crookston Friday.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Ames were over from Terrebonne Saturday.

Jos Paradis drove to Crookston and back, Tuesday. Says it looks very dull there.

Mr. Le Freniere is working on the foundation of his house on Main, near 2d st.

Mr. and Mrs. John H. Pratt arrived Tuesday a. m. from Grafton on a visit to relatives.

L. Benoit, wife and sister spent last week guests at the residence of Geo. LaBissoniere.

Mr. Schenecker will open a general hardware business in the Theodore Schmitz building.

Lost.—A girl's silver bracelet on the Island, July 4th. Finder will please deliver to this office.

Mr. and Mrs. August Riechel Jr. were over from Keystone to spend the glorious Fourth. Aug. returned Tuesday morning.

The saloon keepers, the churches, the band and confectioneries got the greater benefit from the Fourth of July celebration.

Mr. Stewart, who formerly resided here, arrived Monday evening. Mr. Stewart and Miss Lizzie Fairweather were married yesterday.

The St. Hilaire base ball team did not put in an appearance Saturday. They went to Thief River Falls and won a game that scored 38 to 4.

Miss Gusta Akerlund, of Crookston has been the guest of Mrs. Hennings, having spent the Fourth in our city. She will remain until Saturday.

The town hall question has been incubating for the past two years and has finally hatched. It is proposed to sell the bonds voted and erect the building.

Our merchants did a tremendous business last week. In several of the stores the sales ran up to $509 in a day. Business has been better all along than for several years.

W. A. Schreiter has just received a shipment of machine oils. Farmers that are in need of oils for machinery will save money if they buy their oils of Schreiter.

The grasshopper scare has resulted in definite action on the part of the state. Commissioner Kirsch is in town with a state inspector investigating the matter.

Mrs. McLain, of Larimore, N. D., a friend of Mrs. J. D. Marshall, spent several days of this and last week visiting at the latter's home. She returned Tuesday morning.

Mr. S. Chapin, a brother of Dr. Chapin of Euclid, arrived from New York last week. Yesterday morning he started for Beltrami county in company with Wm. Ralph.

Joe Bray took to-night's train for Staples Mills where he will probably remain during the summer. Few of the boys are more popular than Joseph and his departure is regretted on all sides.

A large number of citizens would like to see a race track located here. Doubtless if some one took sufficient interest to canvass for subscriptions a sum adequate to the wants of the case might be raised and a good track got in order.

An alliance meeting will be held at the council rooms in this city next Saturday at 2 o'clock p. m. Mr. Jeffers, the secretary of this alliance, informs us that several matters of importance will come up at this meeting, so a full attendance is desirable.

The schoolboard met Tuesday night and engaged three teachers for the vacancies. Prof. Rutherford, a graduate of the State University, was engaged as principal. Miss Alice Robertson, of Argyle, Wis., was hired as teacher in the intermediate department, and Mrs. Wm. J. Dargan for the North Side primary. But onebih received for building the schoolhouse, and bids will be advertised for again.

Through the medium of a handsome folder just received, we learn that the Minneapolis Exposition reopens its doors this season on August 26th, and continues one month. The folder contains a long list of attractions, from a perusal of which we are satisfied that the Exposition of 1891 will be superior to that of any other season. The list includes such sterling features as the Mexican Band that created such a furore at the New Orleans Exposition in 1885, a genuine Japanese village, the Sanford Girls Orchestra, a display of weapons, many of them relics of the civil war, etc.

Father Balluff has resigned the pastorate of St. Mary's church and, responding to the call of the Archbishop, left town. Father Balluff has done much for St. Mary's parish, and his good deeds are not forgotten. It is to be regretted, the occasion that necessitated his departure, and such a close of a career so exemplary in the first period of his sojourn among us.

W. A. Schreiter drove to Thief River Falls Monday. While there he condoned with Carl Kretschmar and they passed a resolution of mutual sympathy for their present lonely lot. W. A. says Thief River Falls looks bright; the large hotel will soon be open together with a bank, saloon and general merchandise store. The new saw mill is being erected and Jacklin & Olm are at work on the flouring mill.

Hon. E. W. Durand of Stillwater has been made president of the recently organized democratic "what-is it." Mr. Durand who, from facial resemblance to the Maine man, might be christened the plumed knight of Minnesota—has all the qualities that go to make up a fit candidate for governor. He is a race horse in the political field, popular, and the democrats might do a meaner act than nominate him for their standerd bearer.

A Sample Office Holder.

There is one man holding a county office under the holy and unspotted reformers whose character has been impeached and the impeachment according to the supreme court stands good. The farmers alliance movement would have more friends in Polk county if they looked a little more into the character of the men whom they nominate for office. True, the alliance has the votes to elect such men but it is through ignorance of the men that they are permitted to hold office. Is a man whose character has gone through the solemn process of impeachment a fit representative of the people? How long do the farmers expect to remain in power when it is proved that their blabber mouthed idol's reputation for truth and veracity is very bad in the community in which he resides.

TEN MINUTES TO TWELVE

BY M. G. McCLELLAND.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]

panion's speech pass. His intercourse with Phyllis, restricted as it had necessarily been, had awakened within him a tender, chivalrous devotion, touched and materialized by admiration and a sense of personal possession. Her acceptance of and absolute trust in him, her sweetness, patience and courage, won on him day by day. His professional instinct prevented him from feeling any of that intangible, egotistic shrinking from affliction inherent in so many men, and the hopefulness of her case caused it to present no bar to her attractiveness. Then, too, it is probable that the consciousness that she was his wife—no matter how she had become so—stirred and influenced his emotions more deeply than he was himself aware.

He was very considerate and gentle with her, having always in mind that time of disclosure which must surely come. He had taken no advantage of the situation, and he intended to take none. Probably his unconscious manliness explained the readiness with which Mrs. Hart had constituted herself his ally. Her own instincts in regard to her sex were tender and protective.

"What are you going to do?"

She had risen, for from the room across the hall there came to her ear the sound of soft music. The blind girl had found her way to the piano, and was cheering her darkness in the manner she loved best. They had left her long enough alone.

Royal squared himself.

"It would make a pretty case," he observed impersonally. "The lawyers told me so. That ten minutes to 12—time of the death and the ceremony—would admit of considerable argument. The 'shake-bag' fellows would flock to it like hogs to the call of corn. But I'm going to give them the go-by, divorce courts and all. I shall stand to my marriage."

"And the money?"

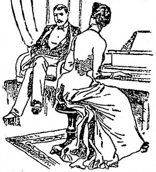
Royal's thought consigned the money to the halls of Eblis with emphasis and dispatch; his speech was more circumspect:

"The money has done harm enough. It has been the active agent in the imbroglio. We'll let that part of the business mellow for a while. John Royal's legacy is of vastly more importance than his aunt's."

The expression of Mrs. Hart's face as she quitted the room was like spring weather, a conflict between sunshine and shower. She managed, however, to cast a jest back at him over her shoulder:

"In the division there'll perhaps be enough to buy a ring for Phyllis—by putting two parts together. My own share shall be devoted to defraying the expenses for making my will according to the Royal prerogative."

CHAPTER IX.



They were sitting in a darkened room.

A decision once reached, Royal's mind clarified, like a pool in the quiescence which follows a violent stirring up. His difficulties were by no means dissolved or dissipated, any more than is the mud at the bottom of the pool, but for the moment they sank out of sight.

The day following was the one appointed for the operation, and when that should be over he would go away for a time, so as to leave Phyllis in the state of absolute calm which would be essential to complete the cure. He had already exceeded the limit he had allowed himself for holiday making, and his affairs in the west required his presence. His practice had been intrusted to a brother physician on whose time and courtesy he felt he could no longer trespass, and, as he had assumed new responsibilities, and was, moreover, a man by no means independent of his own exertions, it behooved him to return home and look after his interests.

Phyllis must remain in Alexandria to be near the oculist for many months to come, and during that time Royal hoped to arrange matters in such a fashion as to withdraw his future, in a measure, from the shadow of the dead man's past. The feeling of possession, of being himself, and yet other than himself, which had been so strong upon him during the ceremony, had modified, but enough of it remained to make him restive. To himself he neither denied the impression nor attempted to explain it, and he spoke of the matter to no one. That the soul of a dying man, freed from the material in the intensity of a dominant and unfulfilled desire, should, operating through spiritual or imaginative laws, influence the soul of another man dominated by the same desire and in an abnormally quickened condition by reason of nervous excitement, was to him a thinkable proposition, and one which it would require no more credulity to admit than would be demanded by nine-tenths of the theses constantly presented for the consideration of mankind.

The intellectual man was in Royal sufficiently developed to enable him to recognize that all thought pertaining to that infinite which permeates and transcends material things must forever root itself in instinct and intuition, and also that his individual knowledge of the laws of spirit or imagination, gleaned from observation of their manifestation in the life of matter, was, relative to his ignorance, as a single plume from an eagle's wing to the sum of the bird's aerial journeyings.

Still, withal, Royal was a very human natured man, and since realization that Phyllis was his own wife had come to him matrimonial association of her, even in idea, with another man had become offensive. It was not that he was jealous of the dead man's memory; Royal was not sufficiently in love for that, and would besides have been incapable of the meanness. Phyllis, as his wife, would be quite as free to expend regret upon her cousin as though she were still unwed. That which galled Royal was his inability for the time to escape, in her thought, from the dead man's identity—the knowledge that he was not himself to her, but the incarnation of another soul. It gave him when with her a sense of duality which was maddening. The endeavor to think the things which John Royal might have thought, and to speak the words which John Royal might have spoken, made him at times feel almost ready to cut his own throat, if only to evict the interloping spirit which seemed to share the material tenement with his own.

"I know to the finest fiber of sensation how it feels to be haunted," he whimsically declared to Mrs. Hart. "Ever since that fellow thrust his identity upon me my soul has had a Siamese twin. He ought to be ashamed to hang on to earth so. It's stealing a march on the other ghosts who have cut into the Infinite the instant death shuts the door on them."

"It won't be for long now," comforted the lady. "And after a while, when it shall have become past experience, you'll view it as a psychological phenomenon of great interest and importance. You'll take pride in it as an exceptional manifestation of heaven knows what, and write articles, which nobody will read, or could understand if they did, devoted entirely to its analysis—from which you will gain renown."

"That may be," grumbled Royal, "but as present experience I find duality of being disconcerting. If I don't get out of this before long I'll blurt the whole truth out to Phyllis, if only to give my incommoded soul standing room in its abode."

Mrs. Hart laughed. "I wonder Phyllis has never suspected anything. The idea that you may be other than you seem never appears to shadow her mind. To be sure, the time has been short and your intercourse desultory and superficial; added to which, her whole soul is absorbed in anticipations about the recovery of her sight. But you are obliged to make blunders—multitudes of blunders—and she ought to notice them. I'm disappointed in her penetration."

"You needn't be," Royal retorted. "My familiar stands by me better than that. When I blunder I recover myself with a nimbleness and celerity which would shame an acrobat. You underrate my ability. I'm getting in a stock of substitution and suppression which would furnish capital for the founders of many theories. Besides, we've the margin of those six years, into which considerable change may be crowded."

In which last statement Royal fastened on a truth, for with Phyllis all discrepancies (and the time, as Mrs. Hart remarked, had been too short for many) were put down to the inevitable growth, modification and readjustments effected by the passage of time. Phyllis was a sensible girl, wise with the wisdom of thought and nature, and she was conscious of so much change in herself that it seemed reasonable to suppose that her cousin had changed also. That he had ceased to be a demonstrative man had surprised her at first, because the lover of her memory had been addicted to endearments.

Then she reflected that it was quite natural he should no longer love her in the old way, since, latterly, that long gap had not even been bridged by letters. It would take time and mutual knowledge to erect a new love, or rather a new superstructure of love in which to dwell; for the foundation must be secure still, else he could not have done for her sake the things which she knew he had done. She did not associate the idea of the money with his conduct in any ignoble way. There was no intimate juxtaposition between love and money in her mind, for life on a lonely country farm prevents the two from seeming in any way interdependent.

She could think the matter out at leisure and demonstrate it quite to her satisfaction, for she was no more actively in love than she supposed her cousin to be—only deeply grateful, and filled with trust in him and content that he should be her husband. No man could be more considerate, she thought, or show more solicitude in regard to obedience to instructions—although, to be sure, he was a physician himself, which of course gave them greater value in his eyes. His self control appeared to her noble and beautiful, and she determined that when her eyes should be opened—unconsciously she used the scriptural phrase—she would show him how sweet a thing could be a woman's gratitude.

Then her thought would hover yearningly, as it had done for years, over her chances of recovery of sight, until she would bethink her of the oculist's instructions and dismiss the matter as much as might be from her mind.

Save in the matter of caresses (which he felt would be an unfair advantage to take of her), Royal was not remiss in loverlike attentions. He intended to win the girl's love if possible before he should claim her as his wife, for he had wholesome notions relative to marriage. While not consciously in love as yet he was strongly attracted, and he healthily and manfully set himself to make of the attraction a line which the stronger emotion would find it easy to follow. It was in his favor that he had had no previous affaire de cœur—that his profession had insensibly led him to generalize women. It was in his favor also that when he embarked upon an enterprise his nature drove him on the course without much regard for wind or tide. If a man should marry a woman it was his business to love her as his own soul, and to strain every nerve to make her happy. Such was his simple creed, as it is, unconfessedly, the creed of more men than gain credit for it with either the world or women.

So Phyllis discovered in him no lack, being preoccupied by her great hope and not rendered exacting by any selfishness of passion. Once a thought, or rather speculation, as to the events of those six years of absence caused her to put a question to him. They were sitting in a darkened room, the girl at the piano and Royal in a low chair not far removed from her. She had been playing for him, soft music with minor cadences. Something in it suggested the thought to which she gave utterance with the directness of a child:

"Have you ever loved a woman, John? Not me, in that old time when we were both so young and didn't understand things. I mean real love—the kind of feeling that makes thought of one particular woman like the pulse of a man's heart to him. You needn't be afraid to tell me if you should have. I shall not be jealous." Then, slowly, and more truthfully, "At least I don't think I shall."

The end of her sentence suggested a possibility which brought a smile to Royal's lips and set his nerves to thrilling. Had she been other than she was he might have been tempted to the experiment of quickening love by goading it with the baser passion. But in her helpless darkness he felt that a man would be a brute who should even wound her vanity.

"No," he answered simply. "I have never loved a woman—that is, any other woman but you."

She turned toward him with the swiftness and certainty of a woman gifted with sight, and laid her hand upon his arm. Then, before he could divine her intention, she had slipped from her place at the instrument and was on her knees beside his chair. He trembled a little, but kept still. She laid her other hand against his cheek and turned his face toward her.

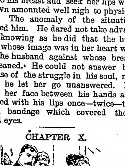
"There is something I want you to do for me, John," she said, in a low voice; "just a little thing, but it will make a difference to us later on. If you had ever loved another woman, I should not ask it—should not want it; but now"——

"Yes?" he murmured, for she had paused.

Her head drooped toward him until her forehead touched his shoulder. "Let my husband's face be the first that my eyes shall see when the light of day is given back to them," she whispered.

Royal's pulses throbbed madly, and his effort to restrain his longing to clasp her to his breast and seek her lips with his own amounted well nigh to physical pain. The anomaly of the situation mocked him. He dared not take advantage, knowing as he did that the husband whose image was in her heart was not the husband against whose breast she leaned. He could not answer her because of the struggle in his soul, nor could he let her go unanswered. He lifted her face between his hands and touched with his lips once—twice—the silken bandage which covered those sealed eyes.

CHAPTER X.



They started and turned to find her in the full light of the window.

It has been said that "to know a woman a man must love her." The phrase should be amended to this, "to know himself a man should love a woman," and so it would contain more verity. For a man's love is like quicksilver, and collects all the true metal of his nature and runs away with it into the receiving pan of the woman's nature whom he loves, so that all his gold being withdrawn, he can obtain an undazzled view of the grit, dirt and rubbish of which he may be composed, which inspection may result in the removal of some portion of the unsightly mass.

With the touch of his wife's face for the first time against his breast Royal's emotions developed like a plant when light falls on it. Pity smiled and moved aside her wings and discovered a beautiful new born love cradled in his heart. And at sight of it the man, in spirit, bowed himself, even as the wise men of long ago had bowed themselves at the birth of love more perfect.

Her request had touched and stirred him, and he alternated between longing to let her have her own way and dread of what might be the consequences. He had gone over the situation so often that his perspective had become confused, and his mind sometimes failed to grasp the true relation of values. In that matter of recognition, for instance, it did not occur to him that recollection of John Royal's face must necessarily have faded with the passage of years, particularly as the nature of things made it impossible that it should have been, during the latter portion at least of his absence, quickened by the inspection of photographs. The dead man's features were so vividly present in his own memory that he failed to realize that they could not be equally stamped on Phyllis'.

The knowledge that they were not was brought home to him, not by the rational exercise of the powers with which he had been gifted, but by a totally outside happening.

The all important day dawned, waxed and waned as other days. The oculist, a tiny man with a reputation which it took two continents to hold, came and did his work and went his way, leaving behind him success, joy and the certainty, humanly speaking, of permanent cure. For months to come the utmost care, quiet and caution were enjoined, and then, if all things should go well, the night of years would give place to the blessedness of sunshine.

During the operation the patient had been held under an anodyne, and when she came again to herself it was to find the bandage still over her eyes and all external circumstances much as they had been. Her disappointment was intense.

"You did not let me see," she said reproachfully, "and I wanted to see—just one little blessed glimpse of light after all this long darkness."

They comforted her with reports of the success of the operation and the oculist's cheering forecast, and preached patience to her, as though she needed it, and also as though the fag end of a siege of patience were not just the hardest part of all.

Royal's plans for departure had been made and announced, but he lingered for a day or two, treating his resolution, and anxious likewise for a little rest before more happenings should come.

"You had better go and be done with it," Mrs. Hart insisted. "You can't tell her yet, because she's a woman and will certainly weep when told, and tears at this juncture would be ruinous. You'll be obliged to come back in a couple of months to meet the executors, and then you can make a clean breast all around."

Even Phyllis was sensible about it, a great deal too sensible, Royal thought. He would have liked to see her manifest more desire to keep him with her. In his rapidly growing absorption in his new emotion he neglected to allow for the fact that the girl's heart was too full of the gloria in excelsis over her own deliverance to admit of much fretting over trifles. But, then, when did an absence of months from the side of the beloved ever appear a trifle in the eyes of a man in love? To Royal's thinking the women—but particularly Phyllis—displayed a callousness that was indecent. Love, as well as amour propre, was wounded, and he felt sore, resentful, and very low in his mind.

"Do you think she'll ever forgive me?" he gloomily inquired of Mrs. Hart on the eve of his departure. "I don't see how she can myself. It seems such a horrid job to have put up on a woman! It didn't look that way at the time to me, or to John Royal either, that I'll swear. It looks tremendously different now from what it did then."

Which is not to be wondered at, considering that love had provided him with the capacity for another point of view. Mrs. Hart turned her head away and laughed in secret places. She saw how it was with him, and gloated over it. The solution of the difficulty would come in the natural and soul satisfying way dear to the heart of a woman who healthily loved romance.

"There is no reason under heaven why she shouldn't forgive you," she responded cheeringly. "You did a crazy, witless thing, but you did it with good intentions and entangled yourself as badly as you did her. And you are certainly doing your utmost to redeem your foolishness. Don't be disheartened. When Phyllis shall have gotten over the shock of your change of identity things will adjust themselves and she'll adopt you. Come back when the fruition of her hope is fresh on her, and you'll find her in too softened and thankful a mood to admit of harsh judgment."

Royal gravely regarded her.

"After all," he observed speculatively, "a live dog is better than a dead lion."

"If you like to put it that way," she laughed. "To me it sounds unflattering, and I do not admit the inference."

Then they spoke of other matters.

The light in the parlor was subdued, for the shades were lowered. It was irksome to Phyllis to be confined to one room, and troublesome to other people to run about and lower shades, so Mrs. Hart kept the whole house darkened, and groped and stumbled about herself with the greatest amiability, compelling her servants and guests to do the same. Sometimes, however, when Phyllis was not in the room, she would pull up a shade and let in a flood of light, to convince herself, she said, that she was only by choice an owl. She uncovered a window now and stood beside it, talking to Royal.

Neither of them noticed that Phyllis had entered the room. She knew her way about perfectly, and was seldom awkward or unfortunate. The first intimation they had of her presence was a low, delighted laugh. They started and turned, to find her in the full light of the window, shading her uncovered eyes with her arched hands, from one of which dangled the bandage.

An engine running backward at the rate of thirty miles an hour, drawing an excursion train, jumped the track, and thirty people are injured several fatally. Has Ohio a law making directors or officers responsible for murders of this kind?

History says the ancient Greeks used olive leaves for ballots, and the Australian voting system is a revival of the practice in Rome 2,000 years ago. History repeats itself. Modern improvements are often only the revival of an ancient vogue of some sort.

Divorces at $24 each on the instalment plan have made a Chicago lawyer rich. His fee is modest, he is engaged in business that is certainly not lacking in popularity in Chicago, and yet his fellow lawyers are trying to disbar him. It is a clear case of envy.

Rev. Sam Jones thus defends the class to which he belongs. "I don't care what you call the expert—evangelist, revivalist, ecclesiastical tramp or what not—the fact that so many pastors need and call for him is proof of the proposition that the ordinary means do not reach the case."

A contemporary thinks that "the best man an American girl to wed is an American man." There is profound truth in this assertion. American men themselves believe it and have been heard to say as much. On the other hand, the best girl for anybody to wed is an American girl. These facts reveal the necessity of an alien marriage contract law to protect the American in his right to marry his own girl.

It is said that a petition is about to be sent from Philadelphia bearing 300,000 names and praying the Czar that he will deal more leniently with his political prisoners. Judging from the fate of such petitions in the past it will promptly be assigned to a pigeon hole and never reach the autocrat of all the Russias. The effect of the British petition against the Hebrew prosecutions is too recent to need comment.

A Burmese woman, who was alarmed by the long-continued absence of her husband, consulting a "charmer" as to the best means of securing his return. She was told to place a lighted candle on her bed and leave the house for at least half an hour. She placed the lighted candle under her mosquito curtain and went away, only to return to find her house and the adjoining ones in flames. The fire spread and 133 houses were destroyed.

The Electrical Review says that an official of the New England Telephone company has been making some calculations, and has found that to handle its messages on the street instead of over its wires would require the service of 10,000 boys. This gives an idea of the value of a blessing which is never thoroughly appreciated until it has taken its flight. It is probable that the Cincinnati Telephone company would require an equally large army of boys to carry its messages.

A number of those extraordinary individuals known to the reporters as "prominent citizens" met in solemn session in Huntington, W. Va., the other day, drew up a paper ordering a certain dashing woman to leave town—on the ground that she was an improper character—and then signed their prominent names to the document. When the widow received the communication she straightway turned it over to her lawyer, who began suits for libel against each of the signers. As a perilous plaything, the widow still holds her own against the unloaded pistol and the buzz-saw.

HINTS TO WOMEN ABOUT NOTES.

An English Custom That Might Be Followed With Great Profit.

From the manner to the matter of notes is a short step. In this respect American women can learn several good points from their English cousins, their Old World cousins, indeed, for both German and French women are equally with the English-woman skilled in the art of note-writing. In polite society notes are a valuable current coin—a courteous, tactful note often steering its writer safely over a threatening rock. On the other hand, it is easy to place too much dependence upon these paper messengers—a fault which some young women of the moment seem likely to fall into.

Said one young girl, meeting another in a friend's parlor the other day: "Mrs. T. feels quite hurt that you did not call on her niece."

"Does she?" was the careless reply. "I must write her a note smoothing it over."

Almost with the same breath the first speaker remarked further: "Mr. — was at the house last evening; he spoke about your having so prettily explained about the tennis fiasco."

"Goodness," ejaculated the other, "what an escape! I had forgotten entirely I wrote to him of that matter. It was on my mind to go home today and send him an especially fetching note. Now, I dimly recall having done so."

Here, evidently, was a young woman who wrote notes recklessly, and, it is to be feared, unscrupulously, through which practice she will be apt to come to grief some time.

To an English woman of any position her correspondence is one of her most serious duties. She spends a certain portion of every day at her desk, and she would as soon think of not responding to a friend's greeting as omitting to answer promptly and carefully a friend's letter, or, indeed, any addressed to her from friend or stranger.—N. Y. Times.

SHE HAD ALL THE BEST OF IT.

He was a red-nosed and eke a cynical conductor, and all the way some dozen or more blocks he spoke of the intense delight that women take in humiliating and troubling street-car conductors in general, himself in particular. He dwelt on woman's proneness to pass bad coins and otherwise defraud honest conductors.

It was while he was talking that a pleasant-faced lady signaled the car and got in. She handed the conductor a $1 bill from which to take her fare and he came to the rear, where the reporter was to make the change.

"Woman all over," he growled. "Has the right change, but wants to make trouble."

Then he carefully and thoughtfully made up the lady's change in pennies and five-cent pieces. He put them in her hand and came back to the rear.

"Wait till you see her kick," he said gleefully.

"But she didn't "kick." She calmly counted over the change and then beckoned to the conductor.

"Conductor!" she said simply. "You have not given me the right change. I have 10 cents more than I should have. Here it is," and she handed it to him, not in pennies, as she might have done, but in the shape of two five-cent pieces.

"I give you my solemn word, young fellow," he said, "that I've been a long time in this business an' I never saw no woman do that sort of thing before. I wouldn't have tho't such a thing could happen."

And he said no more of woman's dishonesty, for it was clear that he was both pained and in a sense humiliated.—New York Recorder.

The Bully and the Butt.

The recent resignation of his chair in the Senate by Mr. Reagan, of Texas, has served to recall the incident which led him to leave Tennessee, where he was born, and settle in the Lone Star State. It appears that one day he went to mill with a grist to be ground, and after he had waited in line until his turn came, he was rudely addressed by a man who proposed to step in ahead of him, and threatened to throw him out of the window unless he would yield his place. Mr. Reagan, the story goes, like all the rest of the people in the neighborhood. was more or less terrorized by this desperado, and in fear of his life rushed for him, butted him in the stomach with his head, and literally lifted him off his feet and flung him through the window. When the desperado disappeared, the consequence of his act flashed upon young Reagan's mind. He instantly supposed that he had killed a man, that he would be hanged for it, and scared almost to death, he rushed downstairs, unhitched his horse and lit out across the country for Texas. The man was not killed, but got a good shaking up. He soon moved to Texas, and was a friend to Reagan in after life.

Mrs. Stowe's First Literary Earnings.

"With the first money I earned by writing (says Mrs. Beecher Stowe) I bought a feather bed. After this I thought that I had discovered the philosopher's stone. So when a new carpet or matress was going to be needed, or when at the close of the year it began to be evident that my family accounts, like poor Dora's, 'wouldn't add up,' then I used to say to my faithful friend and factotum Anna, who shared all my joys and sorrows, 'Now, if, you will keep the babies and attend to the things in the house for one day I'll write a piece, and then we shall be out of the scrape,'"

CONVICTS CRUSHED.

Louisiana's Penitentiary at Baton Rouge Partially Demolished by a Terrible Cyclone.

Ten Convicts Caught Beneath the Falling Walls and Instantly Crushed to Death.

BATON ROUGE, La., July 7.—A terrible cyclone struck this city this morning, passing from southwest to northeast. It entered the city at the Garig brick yard, passed up through Catfishtown and struck the hill just to the east of John Johnston's residence.

Its path continued in a northeasterly direction, crossing North Boulevard, a hundred yards to the east of the governor's mansion. It then went north striking the penitentiary building. Ten convicts were killed and thirty-six injured. The following is a list of the dead:

Whites—Isaac McClelland of Calcasiu, J. A. Waggoner of Claiborne, Fred Cage of Ouachita, James Van Metter of Latchitchez, John Gibson, who was one of the Mealey murderers, and William Willow of Orleans.

The list of wounded follows:

Colored, from New Orleans: Jake Jones, Samuel Jackson, Major White, William Gibson.

Of the number wounded six are expected to die, and the recovery of several of the others is extremely doubtful. The total damage to the penitentiary buildings is estimated at $30,000.

There were forty prisoners at work in the pants factory at the time of the crash, and of that number six were killed and twenty-two wounded and horribly crushed. On the second story or central floor was the hospital, where twenty sick prisoners lay undergoing medical treatment, of which four were killed and fourteen seriously it not fatally injured.

The fire alarm was sounded and the entire fire department was summoned to the scene of the dreadful catastrophe, and, together with the citizens and prison officials, aided by the uninjured prisoners, worked vigorously for the rescue of the unfortunate souls who lay, some dead and others dying, confined under the great heap of debris that was strewn over every quarter of the premises.

Scenes of the greatest imaginable horror greeted the eyes of those engaged in the rescuing work, and the pitiful wails and death groans from the men buried out of sight by massive heaps of brick and mortar could be heard arising from every part of the wreck imploring help, and altogether the scene was heartrending. The storm was attended by a most violent rain, in which the rescuers worked and toiled for several hours, or until both the living and the dead were extricated from the ruins.

SEVERAL CITIZENS INJURED.

The southern portion of the city, styled "catfish town," suffered great loss and damage of property. In this section of the city several persons were seriously hurt and bruised by flying timbers from falling houses and fences.

The drug store of B. A. Day was completely demolished and gutted of its contents, the loss amounting to $5,000. Several of the small groceries in this vicinity were destroyed. The brick yard of Garry, Reddy & Co. was damaged, but the loss is covered by insurance, which is the only storm policy held by those damaged.

The damage throughout the city cannot accurately be estimated at this time, but it can be said that it is the greatest loss this town has ever sustained from a cyclone or from a fire. The cyclone did not make a straight sweep through the city, but would strike the ground and bound forward like a bouncing ball. It would pass over several houses at a time, and descending again tear its way for hundreds of feet. The trunks of large oaks were popped off like pipestems.

In the city fifty houses at least were unroofed or destroyed. J. H. Young and members of his family were seriously hurt by the collapse of their house. Mrs. Cotton, son and two daughters, living in a brick house, were injured in the falling of the building. Mrs. Cotton received a dangerous blow on the back of the head, and also internal injuries, while one of the girls was cut on the limb. Mrs. Cotton, it is thought, will recover.

POSSIBLY A MURDER.

An Unfortunate Affair at an Alliance Gathering.

FERGUS FALLS, Minn., Special Telegram, July 7.—The village of Henning, where W. W. Erwin spoke on the Fourth of July, was the scene of an exciting fracas in which C. W. Brandborg, the well known Alliance man, was a participant, and which may result in the death of Hans Monson, a young man.

While Mr. Erwin was speaking an Alliance man, a little drunk, began to disturb the meeting and Brandborg ordered his arrest. After he had been put in the lock-up the crowd surrounded Brandborg and wanted him to release the prisoner. Brandborg struck one of the men and knocked him senseless.

When Brandborg started for his home in the country a big crowd of Norwegians followed him. A short distance out of town they overtook him. He seized a stick and ordered them to stop. As they advanced he struck the leader on the head a fearful blow, from which he is still unconscious. The crowd then turned and fled. The doctors are afraid the blow may prove fatal.

SUNK AT SEA.

An Accident in Which Seventeen Lives Are Thought to Be Lost.

LONDON, July 7.—During a fog early this morning off Dover the steamer Kinloch collided with the steamer Dunholme, bound from Middlesborough to Rio Janiero.

There was no time to lower the boats, the Dunholme sinking two minutes after the collision.

Seventeen of the persons on board at the time of the collision are missing. The captain, mate, two sailors and three firemen of the Dunholme are saved.

American Rabbis.

BALTIMORE, July 7.—The central conference of American rabbis was in session here to-day. The deliberations were concluded at night. It was decided to meet next year in this city. A resolution was adopted stating that the conference heartily reciprocates the fraternal greetings of the Jewish ministers' association of America, and expresses the hope that in the near future a platform may be formed on which all the Jewish ministers of America can agree. The conference adopted this much, but refused to recommend the creation of Southern and Western rabbinical conferences.

DREW BOUNCED.

The Philadelphia Bank Examiner Given His Walking Papers.

WASHINGTON, July 7.—The controller of the currency to-day sent a letter to Bank Examiner Drew of Philadelphia, dismissing him from the service, the department having lost confidence in him.

On June 29 Controller Lacy wrote to Bank Examiner Drew asking why Mr. Drew did not, in his report Jan. 6 of the condition of the Keystone bank, state that the bank was indebted on account of clearing house certificates $544,981.

To this Mr. Drew replied that the omission was purely an accident, which he deeply regretted. Controller Lacy's answer to this letter, under date July 2, is as follows:

I have placed your communication, together with all other facts bearing upon the transaction, before the secretary of the treasury, and the same have had very full and careful consideration. As a result, the conclusion was reached that so important an omission, after fifteen days' investigation of the bank, is not consistent with the confidence which must necessarily be reposed by the department in the reports of those appointed to make examination of national banks.

By direction of the secretary I have therefore to request that you forward to this office your resignation as an examiner of national banks. I cannot close this communication without assuring you of my sincerest regret that anything should have occurred which would render necessary the severing of your official relations with this bureau.

No response has yet been received to this last note. Bank Examiner Shepard of Pittsburg was at the treasury department to-day in conference with Controller Lacey, and he and Bank Examiner Betts of Cincinnati will continue to conduct the affairs of the office in Philadelphia until a successor of Dr. Drew shall have been appointed.

THE EMPEROR AT ETON.

Germany's Emperor Visits England's Most Popular College School.

LONDON, July 7.—The emperor of Germany arose early this morning, and after a light breakfast he left Windsor Castle on horseback, accompanied by the duke of Connaught and a brilliant staff, with the intention of visiting Eton, England's most popular college school.

After enjoying a nice bracing ride, the emperor reached Eton's parade ground and there found a well equipped, bright looking body of collegians, about 350 in number, drawn up in line for his inspection. As soon as the emperor arrived near the head of the line the young Eton volunteers presented arms in a most soldierly, precise manner, causing the emperor to smile with approval.

The young amateur soldiers were then put through the manual of arms and other exercises. The youngsters then marched past the emperor, who sat on horseback surrounded by staff officers. The lads' marching was worthy of high praise and evidently greatly pleased the imperial guest of England. After the march past, the Eton volunteers again formed in line and at a preconcerted signal gave three ringing cheers for the emperor, in which greeting they were joined by everybody present, among whom were a crowd of Etonians of the past and present. The emperor was evidently much pleased with this portion of his day's enjoyment.

When the cheering had subsided the emperor rode to the front of the line, and, bowing to the young volunteers, praised the manner in which they had gone through their drill, which, he said, was performed very creditably. The emperor added:

I am very pleased with what I have seen of you. If you are ever called upon to draw sword in earnest I hope you will do so in a good cause and that you will show the same pluck and spirit which has always distinguished British soldiers.

ROBBED AND MURDERED.

CHICAGO, July 7.—An unknown man was robbed and then deliberately murdered in Milton, near Chicago avenue, this morning.

A little past midnight Officers Reynolds and Reddy were patrolling in that neighborhood and noticed a group of men engaged in what they took to be a friendly scuffle. They paid no attention to the disturbance until a shot was fired, when they both ran to the scene. They found a man lying on the sidewalk with a bullet hole over the heart.

Reynolds remained with the dying man while Reddy gave chase to the murderers. He fired four shots at them, but none of the bullets took effect, while they returned the fire each time. All but one made their escape, and he was locked up. He gave the name of Joseph Wright, and asserted that he had no knowledge whatever of the affair. Edward McCabe, an iron worker, who was walking on Milton avenue during the chase, received a bullet wound in the back, and is in a serious condition.

The body of the murdered man has been identified as that of Alex Lund, a clothing cutter.

SHOT BY INDIANS.

Two Men Killed in the Mojave Desert, California.

BAKERSFIELD, Cal., July 7.—July 3 Constables John Powers and Sam Gann, with Mr. McCoy, a liveryman of Lemocco, went out into the Mojave desert, near Coyote Holes, to arrest some Indians charged with firing a hay stack. A fight ensued, and Powers and McCoy were killed; also the Indians and two horses.

Gann's moustache was shot off, but he managed to get Powers' horse, his own having been killed, and rode to the south fork of the Kern river for help. Twelve men went back with him. The two Indians who were killed were found buried in the sand, and the body of Powers was found with the throat cut from ear to ear, and the flesh was torn from McCoy's face in threads.

It was just at dusk when the Indians, who were in ambush, opened fire. The Indians are well mounted and armed, and it is feared more blood will be shed. There were six Indians in the first party, but there are perhaps a hundred more in the vicinity, and several hundred between there and the Inyo country.

A Trusted Treasurer in Jail.

NEW YORK, July 7.—Henry C. Adams, for many years the trusted treasurer of the Universalist relief fund for disabled ministers of the Universalist church, was arrested to-day on an order issued in a civil suit for the recovery of about $17,700, which is the alleged amount of his deficit as treasurer of the fund. The suit was brought at the instance of the board of trustees. Adams' bail was fixed by the court at $15,000, in default of which he was committed to jail.

A Boniface Dies.

NORTHFIELD, Minn., Special, July 7.—Samuel William Cushman, aged seventy, died yesterday at Millersburg. He was an old resident of this county and proprietor of the Millersburg hotel. Until a few years ago he lived in Northfield. He leaves a son and two daughters.

Salvationists Convicted.

RED WING, Minn., Special, July 7.—The Salvation army was tried here to-day for marching on the streets with musical instruments. A verdict of guilty was rendered, but the case will go to the supreme court.

IN THE RANKS.

With steady steps he passed down the street,
Wearing a gown whose folds cannot conceal
The massive strength and grace of every limb;
And, looking in the clear-cut face, you feel
The power of mind. The lips are set by fate,
Deep eyes are steely gray, and, wide and free,
You think of him, swathed in the battle's mist,
Setting the stars of brute won victory.

In sacred offices no sign he makes
That in his veins the fires of passion glow:
That love or hate or leadership of men
Have any place beneath his stole of snow,
Down quiet aisles of the cathedral vast,
Veiled in the light of sacred censers dim,
He slowly leads the clear voiced choristers
Chanting, in ringing tones, the evening hymn.

And then, when silence falls, his voice alone
Lifts up, as if some long-lost day to greet,
Did sorrow, sin, or love, with careless eyes
Teach him to sing with voice so true and sweet?
Who knows the heart of man? The passing day
Flashes a dream of glory ere it dies:
Above the singer is a golden ray
That seems to bear his voice beyond the skies.

With banners and with lights he passed on;
The pageant fades, another voice is there
Calling for peace and grace on all the world:
In echoes sweet you miss the earnest prayer.
Filled with the mystery of passing life.
The song still lingers with you, soft and low,
Stilling the strife that mars the tattered heart,
With absolution from its deepest woe.

He bears no burden here says that one song.
Yet inborn fame all times and places defies;
You see upon his head the crown of bays,
The leader lives within his piercing eyes,
Perchance he long ago laid down the sword,
Content to leave the path ambition trod,
And, in the army of the holy cross,
To strive in peace to lead lost souls to God.

—Samuel Williams Cooper.

MR. AND MRS. BOWSER.

"Mrs. Bowser," began Mr. Bowser as he came down stairs the other morning, "is this house run on a system or is everything expected to take care of itself?"

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"I mean that I have been looking for a shoe string for the last hour and a half and that nothing of the sort can be found!"

"No; I don't believe there is one in the house."

"I presume not! I presume the two hundred pairs I bought in Detroit the day before we left have all been chewed up by the cat or sold to the ragman. If there's a worse run house than ours in America I'd like to see it."

"Why, Mr. Bowser, you only brought home three shoe-strings and you used two of those to tie up your papers."

"Well, where's the other?"

"I can't tell. We may have lost it in moving and unpacking."

"Don't doubt it in the least. While a shoe-string is not as big as a piano or as valuable as a clock the loss of it shows a want of system, a reckless extravagance truly discouraging. Have you got a piece of clothes-line in the house?"

"I—I don't think so," she stammered.

"Probably not! Probably gone to join the shoestring! I must have something to tie up my shoe with, however, and I will use a piece of stovepipe wire.

After breakfast, when ready to go out, he said:

"Mrs. Bowser, I hope you will take this lesson to heart. Carelessness in a wife is a very reprehensible trait."

You are just as careless as I am!" she protested.

"No, ma'am! No ma'am! I never mislay anything, forget anything or lose anything! Very few husbands do. I will go around the world with a pin in my vest and bring the same one back with me. If you go out on the street today you had better have a policeman go with you. If not, you'll lose your purse or be robbed of your cloak."

When Mr. Bowser came up to luncheon he entered the house with a smile on his face and the door-mat in his hand, and said:

"I found a boy walking off with this mat! Has anyone taken the range out of the basement? It's a wonder to me they haven't come in after the carpets!"

"That's a mat the girl put out in the barrel to be carted away," she explained.

"Oh! It is! More reckless extravagance, I see! Mrs. Bowser, I want to sit down with you some day and have a long talk. I think you mean well, but you are deficient in judgment, and your knowledge of the world is very, very limited."

"Do you know everything?" she sarcastically queried.

"Mrs. Bowser." he replied, as he folded his hands under his coat tails and assumed his favorite attitude, "there are probably one or two things I don't know. I don't claim to know it all, and I don't say you know nothing whatever. The husband who does not, however, know forty times as much as his wife would be considered a stick of a man. Did you go out this morning?"

"I did."

"Was your bonnet taken off your head?"

"No, sir."

"Lucky—very lucky! You are to be congratulated. I don't"—

"Mr. Bowser, where's your watch?" she interrupted.

"My watch, Mrs. Bowser—my watch is—great Scotts!"

He dropped his hand to find the chain, but it was not there. He felt for the watch, but it was gone.

"Did you leave it at the jeweler's?" she asked as he stood with open mouth and stared at her.

"Jeweler's! No! It's gone I've lost it! I've been robbed!" he shouted, as he danced around.

"It can't be. Feel in all your pockets."

"Pockets! Pockets! Do you 'spose I carry my watch in my coat-tail pocket! I tell you I've been robbed!"

"Well, don't take on so; your wallet is safe isn't it?"

"G-gone!" he gasped, as he put his hand up—watch and wallet both gone!"

"You must have been robbed in some crowd," she suggested.

"Robbed! Crowd! Robbed! Of course I've been robbed!" he shouted, as he pranced about. "Git that infernal cat off that lounge and lemme lay down, for I'm so weak I can't stand up! Where's that camphor?"

She ran for the bottle as he flopped down, and for the next three minutes he had his nose in the opening.

"You ought to go to the police at once," she finally said.

"G-gone! G-gone!" he gasped.

"But how could you have been robbed?"

"I dunno! Hold the bottle a little higher."

"You are so careful, you know."

"Yes."

"You never mislay anything or forget anything."

"No."

"And never lose anything, and have so much worldly wisdom?"

"Oh! my head!"

"I can't make it out. I am so careless that I might lose a shoestring in moving here from Detroit, but you——"

"Don't talk to me! Over $600 gone!"

"A woman tried to steal my reticule in Buffalo and I had her arrested, but it seems you——"

"Gone! Gone! he groaned.

"Haven't you no idea of when it was taken?" she persisted.

"No!"

"Well, I am sorry, but this will be a great lesson to you. You will be more——"

"Mrs. Bowser!" he interrupted as he suddenly sat up, "I see through it all now. It's as plain as daylight!"

"What do you mean?"

"I thought it was necessary this morning to give you a little advice. I felt it to be my duty as a husband. This is your way of getting even!"

"Why, Mr. Bowser!"

"Don't why Mr. Bowser me! It's as plain as that chair over there!"

"How could I rob you or tell any one else to?" she demanded.

"Never you mind! I see it all! It's all right, Mrs. Bowser—all right! Just let go the camphor bottle and take a seat in the other room! A husband will bear a great deal from the woman he loves, but when crowded too far he turns at bay. I have turned. As soon as I feel a little bit better we will come to an understanding, and you can probably take the noon train for your mother's in Detroit. Robbed! Plundered! But I see through it and know my duty!"

All He Could Eat for 10 Cents.

A young Bostonian visiting Philadelphia and who thought himself very smart, was easily sold by an old "gag." Pretending to be something of an epicure, he was praising the sea products found near the Hub, when a Philadelphia lawyer remarked: But you should eat our oysters. They would knock you silly. Why, I can give you all the Philadelphia oysters you can eat for 10 cenets!"

The Bostonian bet $50 on his reputation as an oyster eater. So one evening, after a period of semi-starvation to fit himself for the contest, he and the lawyer went to a well-known oyster saloon not far from Broad and Chestnut streets. The lawyer threw a dime on the counter and told the oysterman to go ahead. Ten oysters were opened and rapidly consumed by the Bostonian. His mouth watered for more, but the lawyer declined to order them, claiming he had won the $50. A storm of reproaches greeted him, in the midst of which he calmly remarked:

"My dear boy, have you not had all the oysters you can eat for 10 cents? Ask the man. He won't give you any more for the money."—Philadelphia Record.

Fashions in Jewelry.

Two and three-stone rings are worn by men.

There are bracelets with diamond bow-knots.

Black enameled watch chains are made for men in mourning.

The tendency is again for gold linings in silver cups, bowls, cream jugs and the like.

A novelty in individual salts are canoe-shaped ones, with tiny silver paddles for spoons.

For bedrooms and boudoir there are silver-fluted twisted candlesticks, with carved standards.

Scissors with silver handles that fold over and protect the sharp points are made for carrying in one's pocket.

Jewel boxes of rock crystal mounted in silver are counted among other high art articles that find a place in the boudoir.

A Chicken-Ranch on a Roof.

I once knew a man here in New York who used to raise chickens on the top of his house. Everybody laughed at the idea of his being able to make it a success, but I have bought eggs and chickens from him many and many a time, so I know that he did. He built a railing of slats all about the edge of the roof so the chickens could not fly over. He had plenty of fresh earth on the floor, and in one corner a coop where the roosts and nests were, and in another corner an awning was stretched for shade.—N. Y. World.

MARY JANE'S BAKER.

Mary Jane, servant at Cowslip Villa, 7, Sunnybank Terrace, was in most things a perfect gem, but as Mr. Rollit, proprietor of that establishment and Mary Jane's master, declared, she was at times "confoundedly cheeky." Mary Jane herself, in her calmer, unruffled moments, did not deny the soft impeachment, but, with characteristic candor, readily acknowledged its correctness. "She knew it," she said "It was her failing."

Now, Mary Jane was such a sweet, good-tempered-looking girl that no one but those who knew her intimately would ever have suspected that her failing, as she put it, was a propensity for giving back as much as she received and a little over; but, although this one failing, to which she confessed, was hidden from the outside world, Mary Jane had another weakness which, taking a decidedly more tangible form, was clearly visible to other eyes than those of her master and mistress. Failing No. 2 was Joseph Tubbs, the baker.

Strange to say, just as Mary Jane's weakness No. 1 was known but to the Rollit household, so as regards failing No. 2 they were the last people to discover that it existed. For months the baker's man—for Joseph Tubbs was not yet a master—came and went, passing in flowery speeches with the half-quarterns of whites, compliments with the cottage loaves, and blandishments with the brown; and yet Mrs. Rollit, wide-awake woman as she was, never noticed how Mary Jane pricked up her ears when he knocked at the door, nor remarked what a surprising amount of time can be consumed in the delivery and receipt of two households and a tin.

But, in accordance with the principle that lookers-on see most of the game, the people across the road—the Jobsons, at No. 10, in particular—were not long before they perceived it. They soon noticed that the diurnal visits of the baker's man to Cowslip Villa were marked by various little distinctive features not to be observed in any of his calls at the adjoining houses. Never by any chance had he to knock a second time at that door, which was invariably opened almost as soon as he stepped up to it; and yet, strange to say, no such time-saving celerity was to be remarked in the subsequent proceedings, which seemed always to be spun out to the greatest possible length; so much so, that, as she bestowed on him a last parting glance, Mary Jane sometimes lingered so long it seemed as if she must shut her own saucy nose in the closing door.

But even with her movements thus narrowly observed, all would have gone well with Mary Jane had not Master Tommy Rollit taken it into his head to fraternize with Master Bertie Jobson, and thus paved the way for the bringing together of their respective mammas, who, once acquainted, soon progressed to calling upon each other; and, friendly relations being thus established, what was more natural than that, one day, Mrs. Jobson, after making sundry purchases of surprising cheapness at a sale, should send over to Mrs. Rollit to pop in and inspect these bargains?

Now it so happened that that day was a foggy one; but whether it was the knowledge that this being so his movements would be the more effectually concealed, or whether, after his long round in the dismal streets, Joseph Tubbs was overcome by the sight of Mary Jane's beauty, cannot be accurately ascertained. Certain it is, the audacious baker made an attempt to seize one of the housemaid's hands that supported the tray, with the result that in the struggle a loaf fell to the ground. And, what was more unfortunate still, Mrs. Jobson, over the way, keeping an eye on the opposite house as she waited for Mrs. Rollit's coming, was a witness of the whole transaction; and, feeling satisfied that she was only doing a neighborly action in putting Mrs. Rollit upon her guard against what was taking place, faithfully recounted all that she observed to that lady when she arrived.

Mrs. Rollit not a little angry with Mary Jane for her perfidious conduct, on her return at once descended into the lower regions of her establishment to interview the culprit.

Mary Jane, with the aid of a bad pen a penny bottle of ink of doubtful color, was busy writing a letter to her aunt.

"Mary Jane!" commenced Mrs. Rollit, severely, "what is this that I hear about you and the baker's man?"

Mary Jane started, and her face went crimson. Then she gave a little sniff, which Mrs. Rollit knew from experience meant war.

"What is it that you hear, ma'am?" she asked, when her cheeks had almost resumed their natural hue.

"I have heard," said Mrs. Rollit, fixing Mary Jane with as stern a glance as she could muster, "I have heard that when that man——"

Mary Jane dashed her pen upon the table. She stood erect, and with hands by her side confronted her mistress. When people took to calling her Joe "that man" it was more than she could stand.

"I know who told you," she said defiantly, "Mrs. Jobson. She's envious 'cos she can't get her own scarecrows of daughters married."

"Mary Jane!" cried Mrs. Rollit. "How dare you? I would have you speak respectfully of persons who visit this house. Remember that."

"The truth ain't disrespectful," retorted Mary Jane. "And as for this house—I won't stop in it any longer. Joe will soon have a shop of his own, and, thank goodness, I can go and live with my aunt till we're married. It don't matter to me whether I go or stay. So perhaps, ma'am, you'll accept a month's notice."

And with this she flounced out of the kitchen, leaving her mistress standing looking at the kitchen door dumfounded by this sudden outburst.

And so it happened that Mary Jane, after many happy years spent with the Rollits, came to give notice to leave. All on account of the baker.

But about a week before Mary Jane's month's notice expired a dire calamity befell the Rollits that eclipsed all other troubles. Mr. Rollit's partner had, unknown to him, been speculating heavily, and a series of disastrous losses soon brought him to such a position that he was seriously meditating whether he should face his creditors or disappear to foreign parts.

It was a terrible night for them when Mr. Rollit first brought home to his horrified wife the news of this disaster. And next morning, determined, if possible, to weather the impending storm, he proceeded to negotiate a mortgage on his house and raise money on all that it contained, in the hope that sufficient would be forthcoming to meet the bills as they fell due.

But as fast as the cash was procured it was again swallowed up, until at last there remained no further way in which he could obtain a single penny. If the firm could only hold on for another fortnight, it would be saved. Two hundred pounds would do it. Alas! it would be impossible to find another two hundred pence.

Of course Mary Jane, as she went about the house, could not but notice that something was amiss; but the estrangement that had sprung up between mistress and maid forbade her making any sympathetic overtures, though on this, the last day of her stay, she would dearly have liked to do something to comfort the disconsolate woman sitting upstairs alone with her sorrow.

"Ah! here is master. He will soon cheer her up!" said Mary Jane, as she heard the familiar knock at the door. But when Mr. Rollit entered Mary Jane started in surprise to see the look of careworn dejection that was upon his haggard face, and trembling to hear him ask in a hollow voice, "Where is she?" as he tottered up the stairs.

When Mary Jane stood upon the hall mat, rooted to the spot. Whatever could have happened? Then, unable longer to contemplate the prospect of leaving them without knowing if she conld be of aid, she did a thing she had never done before. She crept upstairs and listened.

The door was not shut, only pushed to; and as Mary Jane overheard the wretched husband telling his wife of the failure of all his efforts to raise the required two hundred pounds, she began gradually to comprehend the situation.

"They're in debt," she whispered to herself. "That's why master took to having the cheaper butter!"

"Never mind, little woman," she heard Mr. Rollit say, courageously trying to render the trial easier for his wife to bear. "We have had many worries and troubles before, and borne them successfully together. Let us fate this one, great as it is, and I'm sure it will all come right in the end."

"It shall!" declared Mary Jane, as, suddenly possessed by a brilliant idea, she stole down stairs again, put on her hat, and noiselessly left the house. And as she ran along the streets, clutching the door-key in her hand, "He will do it for me. I know he will. He must!" she kept repeating.

Twenty minutes later she returned and let herself in. And behind her entered Joseph Tubbs.

Mary Jane once more crept upstairs and listened. Still the same low sound of voices from the room where husband and wife, in their misery, were yet striving to find some means of averting the ruin that to-morrow would bring with it.

"No. We are powerless. Two hundred pounds to-morrow would save us, but in this world you don't find people ready to lend their money merely on the security of an honest man's word."

The door opened suddenly. Mary Jane's voice was heard, whispering vigorously, and husband and wife leapt to their feet as a broad-shouldered man stumbled in and stammered. "Yes, you do."

Startled by this intrusion. Mrs. Rollit hurriedly turned up the gas, revealing the desolate-looking room, with its empty grate, before which they had been sitting. "The baker's man!" she cried.

Mary Jane gave her sweetheart a violent nudge. And his face became very red as he awkwardly began:—

"Yes'm. I am the baker's man. Mary Jane said you were in trouble, and that a couple of hundreds would put you on your feet again. I know all about what you've done for her, took her from the orphan school, and made the woman of her, that's going to be my wife. I've got a bit saved and had a few pounds left me that I shan't want till we get married and start a business of our own, I can manage two hundred. Will you take it?"

Mr. Rollit leapt forward. "Do you mean it," he cried, hardly able to believe that he should yet preserve his credit and his home.

"I do mean it," said the baker sturdily. "I ain't got it in cash, but you can have the bits of paper that represent it first thing in the morning.

Unable to speak, Mr. Rollit seized him by the hand; while his wife, with tears running down her cheeks, hung on their preserver's every word spellbound. And behind them, Mary Jane, her eyes glistening, watched the face of the baker as if it were that of a god.

"I don't want no security," continued he, rather huskily, visibly affected by their gratitude. "What you've done for Mary Jane in the past is good enough for me. But by way of interest—perhaps you'll be able to let her stay on here till we're married!"

Do not be afraid to plant more peas for a late supply. If the fall-growing varities are used it will do but little injury if they fall over. Do not be deterred from planting because of the difficulty of providing supports, as they may be omitted.

WE are making a specialty this season of what we call our PARAGON HARNESS. Made of the FINEST STOCK and the very BEST WORKMANSHIP. Such a harness cannot be bought for less than $25. at retail. But we are willing, in order to introduce it, to SELL ONE SET ONLY to one person as a sample for $16.50.

$25.00 HARNESS FOR $16.50

IN GENUINE RUBBER $18.50.

DESCRIPTION OF HARNESS.

A fine Buggy Harness stitched twelve stitches to the inch, except traces which are stitched ten. Is made to represent a $30 harness. It has a 3 or 3 1-2 hand laced leather pad saddle, with covered seat and jockeys; is made from fine stock. Bridle is of usual dimensions, has fine blinds, nice leather front and beautiful rosettes with glass centers, nice nickel bit. Check-rein, either overdraw with nose piece, or side check. Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strip, breeching and girt folds are made either of patent enamel or plain harness leather as preferred, and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased, give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Boxloops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering I will send, free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

Capital Gossip.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July15 th, 1891.—Reports which reach Washington from Bar Harbor, through private sources, confirm certain dispatches printed last week, concerning the condition of Secretary Blaine. These reports are even of a more alarming character than the published dispatches, for they declare in semi confidence that Mr. Blaine is not only a physical wreck, but that the stories told some weeks ago respecting his mental condition are in the main true.

John R. McLean, Proprietor of the "Cincinnati Enquirer", who is spending the summer at Bar Harbor writes to a friend here that Mr. Blain's condition is really alarming. He says: "His decline is rapid, and he is a far sicker man than the world knows of." In fact Mr. McLean makes no secret of his belief that Mr. Blaine will never return to the State Department, and that his resignation will soon be in the hands of President Harrison. Already political speculators are at work selecting a new Secretary of State. The Name of John W. Foster is freely mentioned as Mr. Blaine's successor. Foster, while abundantly equipped in diplomatic ability is perhaps not of sufficient political weight or importance to become Premier. Ex Senator Edmunds is regarded as a strong probability, and his name is more freely accepted just now than that of any other man.

The advent of a little stranger in the family of the Chinese Minister here has been the subject of general rejoicing for the past two weeks at the Legation, where the tiny maiden is kept in strict seclusion until she shall have completed the first month of her existence. This is in accordance with the laws of the Celestial Kingdom, which also require the seclusion of the mother for the same period of time, When the little almond-eyed maiden was three days old she was decked out in the finest of curiously fashioned garments, and carried in State to the large parlor on the first floor of the spacious mansion, where the members of the Legation were invited to pay their respects to the tiny bit of humanity. On that day quite a large number of friends, who had been notified, also called at the Legation and brought presents. The Minister's wife, though forbidden by the custom of her native country from seeing any one, was on that day served with rice and various dainties to tempt her appetite. In the afternoon the baby was given back to its mother, and will not be seen again until she is a month old. The Minister, Mr. Jsui Kwo Yin, has already selected a name for his daughter, but until she is a month old this will be kept a profound secret. Mis Yin is the second child ever born to the family of Chinese Nobility in this country. The first child was named Meau, which translated signifies "Beautiful American."

The order issued by the President last week abolishing the three military divisions into which the country has been dividedsince a short time after the war, and assigning the eight Departments to the command of as many general officers, and leaving Major-General Schofield in command of the Army, makes the number of commands correspond with the number of general officers once more. Ever since the retirement of General Shermam and the death of General Sheridan, with the consequent abolition of the grades of General and Lieutenant-General, there have been more commands than Generals, and at times Colonels have been in command of Departments or Division. Commanders have commanded Departments, as well as their own divisions. The most important practical effect of this order is the curtailing of the important command of Major-general Miles by leaving him only the Department of the Missouri to command, and taking from him the other Department formerly comprising the Division of the Missouri-the Department of the Platte commanded by Brigadier-general Brooke; the Department of Dakota, commanded by Brigadier-general Stanley. This meane that General Miles will figure in no more important Indian campaigns. for the Sioux and other troublesome tribes of the North are in the commands of General Brooke and Merritt, while General Miles is left only the more peaceable tribes in the Indian Territory.

The troublesome Southern Indians are in the Department of Arizona, under Brigadier-general McCook. This is one of the Departments formerly under Brigadier-general Ruger, in the division of the Pacific. General Ruger retains command of the department of California, which the third Department of his old division, that of Columbia, is commanded by Brigadier-general Kautz. The only division commander who loses no territory by the new order is Major-General Howard, whose present command, the Department of the East, has been for some years co-extensive with the division of the Atlantic,

A Novel Event.

Invitations are ont for a dance to-morrow night. They read: "The young ladies of Red Lake Falls request your presence at Opera Hall Friday evening July 17th. Dancing." We have one of 'em and will be there to give a detailed report in our next issue. The enterprise of these Red Lake Falls young ladies is something to be phonographed, to be preserved for the enlightenment of future generations under the title: "Methods in Vogue Among Young Ladies in the Latter Part of the 19th Century." This is the era of woman's aggressiveness. We hope the girls will succeed—unless, indeed, it is some dense plot to ensnare our innocent young men into the realm of irresistible beauty. But as we said, we'll be there to watch developments.

An Interesting Lecture.

There will be issued from the press during this month, a little pamphlet of thirty-two pages entitled "The Church and Poverty", by John Brisben Walker, Ph. D. This is the substance of a letter delivered in Washington before the Catholic University of America. The Washington Star said at the time: "The lecture was in some respects a remarkable effort in the boldness with which he brought home to clergy and laymen their responsibility for many of the social difficulties that beset our civilization. No such plain speaking has been heard upon a platform under similar circumstances, and for this reason as well as because of the food for thought to every one interested in the wellfare and prosperity of his race and the government under which we live, an extended report of the lecture is given." Price 10 cents. For sale by news dealers.

County News.

Settlers on Thief River complain of fish traps along that stream. They not only deprive the settlers of fish, but make the water fairly rotten with dead fish, says the Press.

Editor Duffy, of East Grand Forks, has a new daughter over which he seems to be very much tickled.

Prof. Lugger said to the East Grand Forks Review that there is no danger from hoppers and no future danger if the farmers and others will take the matter in hand at once. There is no doubt that a species of migratory hoppers have made their appearance, although they are not of the regular Rocky Mountain species that did so much damage in the southern part of the state several years ago.

East Grand Forks has a fully equipped fire department.

The Germania House at Crookston is again under the management of Joseph Netzer.

A Real Lady.

We hear the phrase so often, and how hard it is to define its exact meaning. We all know the lady when we meet her, and yet her charm is as indescribable as the scent of a rose or the tints of the sunset sky. It might be said to live in her utter lack of positiveness and best painted in negatives. She is not obtrusive in appearance or dress: she does not claim your attention by any effort to attract it, nor does she seem conscious of your admiration if you evince it. She is never known to speak harshly, maliciously or loudly to superior, equal or inferior.

She does not laugh at anything that could by any possibility wound another, nor seek to introduce into the conversation any topic she has reason to think may prove disagreeable or embarrassing, but, rather, closes her eyes to whatever her keen tact tells her you desire to remain unnoticed. In her judgments she does not seek to impress you with her infallibleness, but is quick to add the saving clause. She does not envy or scorn another's possessions, and would not point out the crumpled rose leaf for the world. She makes no boast of anything, but does not decry her self in any way, so that her sweet pride is humility, and her sweet humility the truest pride. She is no gossip, though she is not above taking an interest in the lowliest that cross her path, and has a womanly sympathy for every sick and suffering thing. She takes up no fad or hobby to the exclusion of other duties, but is consistent in all things, and, without being foolishly conventional, does not neglect to fulfill the least demand of her position. She is not a religious fanatic, and has no hell of excommunication for those not of her way of thinking, but is in the truest and best sense a noble hearted, Christian woman, than which there is no better definition of a lady.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

More Homes For the Homeless.

F. P. McQuillan, C. E., was in the city this week purchasing supplies for a surveying crew who are looking up lands belonging to the Minneapolis & St. Louis road. This road has a land grant from the state which it secured through building a line from Morton, Minnesota, to Watertown, Dak. The land, 20,000 acres, is situate in Polk and Marshal counties, and Mr. McQuillan informs us is mostly fine agricultural lands. It will now be surveyed and placed upon the market by this company. Most of it lies in Polk county, and has been detrimental from the fact that its settlement has been an impossibility. The gentleman will not admit that the company is running any lines with a purpose of building, but appearances indicate that the recent railroad movements in this direction have stirred this company up: A line from Winnipeg, through the Red Lake reservation and running in a southeasterly direction into this city, is admitted by Mr. McQuillan as a feasible route and one which will be built at no distant day. It is our opinion that this line is now being surveyed—in fact we have it from a party who is in it. We may at any time expect developments of a nature calculated to affect Red Lake Falls directly. There is no question but great railroad developments will soon transform Northern Minnesota, and Red Lake Falls figures prominently in every project.

Cats.

Cats, to be of much service, must be trained from infancy. The love for cats is as strong in some human breasts as the love for wife or mother. But often the wife objects to cats, and merely consents to their temporary sojourn under her roof for the sole purpose of destroying the accumulation of mice. Pleadings are in vain; she holds to her resolution, and goes on hating cats from the bottom of her heart. Then she gets a pet canary and all hopes vanish from the breast of the fond husband. The cat is borrowed, however, as usual. He has grown to be one of those large headed, wary Thomases, experienced in the ways of the world almost beyond conception. Little does she dream how one moment's presence of such a cat is far more ruinous than the whole existence of a timid, harmless kitten. They retire; the pantries are opened, to give Thomas full sway; the cellar door stands ajar, and Thomas, as if appreciative of his important position, stalks stealthily about, swaying his tail. It is midnight; there is no sound save the heavy breathing of the sleepers; the cat endeavoring to catch the swinging cage and the fluttering of the bird. A pause—the bottom falls out of the cage with a crash; the bird is dead; a wild shriek from the bedchamber; a lady with a shot gun; a dead cat. What tragedies can not transpire within the brief space of a moment. It is doubtful if this episode will soften the lady's heart towards cats. but she can advise people never to borrow one. The bird cage hangs desolate, the bird and cat sleep side by side, while "rough on rats" and mouse traps dot the peaceful home here, there and everywhere.

Mark Twain.

Has become rich, fat, and as a consequence lazy or else his talent for quaint saying has left him. One of the best things he ever said, in his humorous days was that the vital statistics of the United States Census showed that more people died at home in bed than were killed or fatally injured in railroad accidents therefore, it was far safer to travel then to stay at home. There is perhaps a flaw in Mark's syllogism, whether in premises or conclusion the reader can determine for himself, but there would be nothing illogical in a statement like this: All people wish to avoid accidents when traveling: "The Burlington" has never lost a passenger by an accident: therefor all the people prefer to travel by "The Burlington". This is reliable—for it comes from "The Burlington" itself. For tickets, rates, etc., call on your nearest railroad agent, or address W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent, St. Paul, Minn.

Merit Wins.

We desire to say to our citizens, that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklins Arnica Salve and Electric Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell as well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee them every time, and we stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfactory results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great popularity purely on their merits. W. A. Schreiter Druggist.

This is the Point

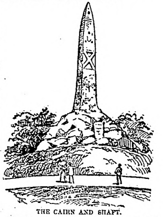
At which the billions of feet of pine of the Red Lake reservation will be manufactured into lumber: There is no doubt about that and never has been. H. O. Fanning, representing the Sands; Maxwell Lumber company, of Michigan, stopped in the city several days this week. Mr. Fanning said that the points of advantage that Red Lake Falls possesses are great; that this will doubtless be the spot where the Red Lake pine will be manufactured. "Your two rivers are one great advantage: The boomage facilities are limitless. As to the shipping facilities; that is as yet secondary. You will get the roads the minute you need them." Mr. Fanning has gone to Red Lake to investigate matters. He says there is one member of his firm anxious to branch out into this section; money is no object with them, as they have any amount of it. "I have written," said he, "that there is the grandest opening for lumber industries here in the world. In fact it is marvelous; the wealth that lies within the grasp of the experienced weathy lumberman. The minute I set eyes on your city with its wonderful advantages, I was amazed and delighted. You will one day have a grand manufacturing city. O yes, you will see me again! I like your city and will make it my head quarters." Thus it will be seen Red Lake Falls begins to be appreciated by intelligent outsiders.

Government Work.

A crew of twelve men are at present engaged taking levels of the waters of the Red Lake and Thief Rivers with the intention, that as soon as the proper levels are taken the government will commence the construction of locks at the outlet of the lake and at such points along the Red Lake River as required to make the river navigable for steamboats. It is the intention to raise the water two feet higher than it is at present, this surplus of water to be witheld during rainy seasons. During dry seasons a sufficient amount will be allowed to run to keep a graded supply in the river. It is not supposed more than one or two locks will be needed between Thief River Falls and Red Lake—the river will be improved by the construction of wing dams which will throw sufficient water into the shallow places to allow boats to pass. P. & J. Meehan have succeeded in getting their large steamer on the lake and the construction of the locks and dams will be facilitated as the boat can be used in conveying material. This work will no doubt be a surprise to many of the people of this section as few knew the government had any intention of commencing improvements at this early day. Let the good work go on. The river should be navigable for steamboats from Thief River to the Lake. It will facilitate the driving of logs and will be an inducement for lumbermen to make this place a center. It also insures the future of Red Lake Falls water power. We will never be troubled with a lack of water, as the Minneapolis mills, for instance. We will then have the greatest water powers in the world.

A Burial Place for Scotia's Sons.

The St. Andrew's society is a Scotch organization, and like other benevolent societies of foreigners is often called on to bury unfortunates who have died in poverty in their new homes. The society in Toronto, Canada, owns a large lot in the cemetery for this purpose, and has recently erected an imposing monument, commonly called "the Scotch cairn."



THE CAIRN AND SHAFT.

The monument stands on a knoll, the surface of which is twenty feet high, and the monument, being thirty-six feet high, will thus rise fifty-six feet above the carriage drive. It is an obelisk of gray granite, with the St. Andrew's cross, and resting on a base of rock bowlders in the shape of a Scotch cairn. The work is singularly appropriate, being Scottish in all its details.

DEAR EYES.

Oh, love! Oh wife! thine eyes are they
My springs from out whose shining gray
Issue the sweet celestial dreams
That feed my life's bright Lake of Dreams.

Oval and large and passion pure,
And gray and large and honor sure;
Soft as a dying violet's breath,
Yet calmly unafraid of death.

Thronged, like two dovecotes of gray doves,
With wife's and mother's and poor folk's lovers,
And home-loves and high-glory loves,
And science loves and story loves.

And loves for all that God and man
Inark and nature make and plan,
And lady loves for spidery lace
And broderies and supple grace.

And diamonds and the whole sweet round
Of littles that large life compound,
And loves for God and God's bare truth,
And loves for Magdalen and Ruth.

Dear eyes, dear eyes, and face complete,
Being heavenly sweet and earthly sweet,
I marvel that God made you mine,
For when he frowns, 'tis then ye shine!

PARTY'S POPPER.

I hate roughing it, simply because I had known what really roughing it meant for five years, and after five years' experience roughing it—to use an Americanism—had come to kinder pall.

I was not sorry to wash my hands of America, of its dreadful climate, and of its dreadful people. I do not want to be ungrateful, but the whole of my time in America had been passed in Firetail canyon, and the people I met in Firetail canyon were decidedly dreadful; and when I turned my back on Firetail Canyon and metaphorically speaking, shook the dust off my feet against America, I was delighted; for I was tired of the brutal, uncivilized, sordid life, and the exceedingly brutal, uncivilized, sordid people whom it had been my misfortune to have to associate with in Firetail city.

The fact is, I had been engineer to the Uncle Dudley silver mine, and having, so to say—speaking in quite an humble way you know—made my pile, I was coming home to England on six months' leave with the intention of bettering myself, if possible, and of not returning to America, Firetail canyon nor the Uncle Dudley mine if I could help it. I carried my little fortune af £6,000 on my person in thousand dollar notes. It was a stupid thing to do. I did it to avoid loss on exchange.

I had four delightful days on the Bithynia. I need not describe the Bithynia—you all know the Bithynia. These four days were peculiarly delightful, because they were passed in the society of Parthenia Persimmon. Parthenia was 18. She had lips ruddier than the cherry and riper than the berry; they were arched like cupid's bow, and on her cheeks the lily and the rose and innumerable dear, delightful dimples struggled for supremacy. Her luxuriant hair was a delicious golden brown—but I need not say any more; it will save your time and mine if I state that Parthenia Persimmon was a Duck of Diamonds. You know what I mean? Exactly so.

If you ask me how Parthenia and I employed our time during those four days, I fear I must reply, "In delicious dalliance," which is a poetic phrase, and expressive. We had never seen each other in our lives before, and my Party's popper was lying in his stateroom very seasick, indeed. Parthenia is such a mouthful, you know, and she has bidden me to call her Party, on the third day of dalliance. "Popper always calls me Party," she had observed. I may explain here that popper is American for father.

As yet I had not seen party's popper, but on the fourth day of dalliance a gentleman of 50, looking very green, indeed, about the gills, was introduced to me by Parthenia as that relative.

Party's popper was evidently a gentleman. He was very quiet, he dressed unobtrusively, he did not talk politics, and he spoke particularly well, throwing in an occasional archaic word or two, which gave a certain special flavor and picturesqueness to that clear, cold, genuine English of his.

I was rather sorry to see Party's popper. No more moonlight walks on the saloon deck, I thought; the days of dalliance are over. Perhaps he would ask my intentions. I did not mind that particularly, for my intentions were strictly honorable, but—and it was a very big but, indeed—I had no idea in the world of the position in life of Party or Party's popper. That is the difficulty about traveling Americans, it is impossible to judge of their position by their clothes, or their luggage, or their talk.

Of one thing alone can you be certain. If an American man or woman sports jewelry save at a ball or a big dinner, then you may be sure that he or she is "shoddy." There was nothing "shoddy" about Persimmon or his daughter. The father sported a three and a half dollar Waterbury and a steel guard. That gave me courage. "I don't want money," I thought to myself. "I am desperately in love with Parthenia, and I have £6,000, I'll propose to her."

I did propose to her.

"You know nothing of me, Mr. St. John," she said in astonishment. She said a great deal more. So did I. The interview ended by her telling me to see as much of her popper as possible, and to try and "get down his back." I understood enough of the American language to know what she meant.

Mr. Persimmon and I grew very friendly. We saw a good deal of each other, and in the evening we went into the smoking room and we played at poker. When I say "we" I mean that I did; for Mr. Persimmon declared that he did not "know enough about cards." I confess that I played a little higher than I could afford, with the idea of dazzling Mr. Persimmon and so creating a favorable impression, which is what Parthenia meant by getting down his back.

If I had hot been so taken up with Party I might have discovered in time that Colonel Jabez Jackpotts, Senator Pat Straddle and Dr. Clapperton Fudge were professional sharpers. On one fatal night they won five-sixths of my little fortune, exactly $25,000. It happened this wise.

The game of poker stripped of its details is very much like the old-fashioned game of brag. As played in the smoking room of the Bithynia, the first player "puts up"—i. e., stakes a small sum; those who decline to play throw down their cards, and the next man to the left exercises his option of "raising" the stakes, or "going better." This goes on at infinitum till those who are betting against the first man decline to stake more money, when the other players show their hands in succession, and the highest hand wins everything, unless the original player exhibits a higher one, or "puts up" a stake so high that the others refuse to cover it, in which case they all pay up to him and look as pleasant as they can. If this takes place, though he takes the money, he does not show his cards. His hand may, in fact, contain nothing; in which case he is said to have "bluffed the table."

Now, the highest possible hand is what is termed a straight flush, or "flush sequence" to the ace—that is to say, ace, king, queen, knave, and ten of one suit. This hand is impossible to beat when it is held by the person who makes the first stake, for even should another player have the extraordinary good luck to hold an equal hand, ties pay.

The rules of the game of poker are extremely strict. All money bet has to be placed upon the table—rubis sur l'odgle, as the French have it.

Now, I had a straight flush in spades dealt me; I was so astonished at my great good fortune that my hand shook as I "planked down" my ten dollars, and declared that I stood "pat"—that is to say that I did not want to better my hand by taking cards. They were evidently a lot of big hands out, for each of the six men playing, though it was plain that I held a big hand or was simply "bluffing," increased the stakes. I put on another one hundred dollars when it came to my turn, for I knew that I must win. Then one of the players was frightened out, and the stake went on increasing until I had three thousane dollars in front of me, for each man "went bitter"—that is to say increased his stake. Two of the players caved in.

Fool that I was, I doubled him again, partly because I knew that I must win, partly because I wished to dazzle Parthenia's popper.

But Colonel Jackpotts "raised" me again, and so we went on till $25,000 in American notes lay in front of each of us. It was five-sixths of my little fortune—five-sixths of all I had in the world, and though I knew that I must win, I gave a sigh of relief as Colonel Jackpots calmly remarked:

"I guess I'll see your swagger hand mister."

"Damnation," cried Colonel Jackpotts. Then he suddedly stretched out his great paw and spread the cards out. And lo! there were six cards—ace, king, queen, knave, ten of spades and the eight of hearts.

"I am sorry for you, mister," remarked Colonel Jabez Jackpotts, with a benignant smile: "that's a foul hand. Hand over them chips."

"I had lost.

How it happened I could not tell "It must have occurred in the dealing," I thought.

I appealed to the bystanders. I offered to refer the matter to a well-known American diplomatist who was looking on.

"You have lost," he said calmly. "You should have examined your cards more carefully. The laws of poker, like those of the Medes and Persians alter not."

Colonel Jabez Jackpotts carefully counted my great pile of notes, and they went into his capacious pocketbook. Then the party broke up.

That night I opened my soul to Mr. Persimmon. "I am a ruined man, sir," I said. "I have lost all I had in the world except $500. I had intended, Mr. Persimmons, to ask you for your daughter's hand. That's all over now, through my absurd folly. I shall never forgive myself, and I've got to begin the world again."

"Was Party fond of you, boy?" he asked laconically. He did not give me time to answer. "Party was fond of you; she told me so herself. It's a lucky thing for you that Party is fond of you. For Party's sake I'll see you through this thing. Jackpotts is a sharper, and Senator Straddle and the doctor are his accomplices."

* * * * * * * *

"For Party's sake," said he, "I'm going to lend you some dollars. Play from that case, Mr. St John; there's only one way of 'besting' a scoundrel like Jackpotts, and for Party's sake he's got to be bested. When I give you the signal by taking out my handkerchief, you go on betting till all's blue, for Jackpotts has got to be bested. Try and not lose your head," said Mr. Persimmon. "Your straight flush hand was right enough last night. Jackpotts is a smart man; it was he who put the eight of hearts there—I saw him do it; but if I, being your friend, had attempted to unmask him, no one would have believed me." Then it all dawned upon me for the first time.

We began to play. We played for about a quarter of an hour; it was my turn to bet. I had nothing in my hand—nothing whatever. I was about to throw it on the table in disgust, when to my horror, I saw Mr. Persimmon take out his handkerchief. I gave him a look of agony; he only smiled.

One by one, as I increased the stakes, the players dropped out. I had over $40,000 staked in front of me, and the money was not mine. It was Parthenia's father's.

"I'll raise you five thousand, mister," said Colonel Jackpotts, in a hollow voice, as he took the very last of his bank notes from his great pocketbook.

"Ten thousand dollars better," I cried, with affected calmness,

"I guess I'll write you a check for ten thousand, mister, and then I'll see you," blurted out the Colonel, his eyes almost starting from his head.

"You'd better post the money," said Mr. Persimmon, blandly.

"You don't object, mister, I take it?" said the Colonel, to me, piteously.

"I object to everything," I replied. "The laws of poker, like those of the Medes and Persians, alter not," I quoted, appealing to the well known American diplomatist.

"That is so," remarked that gentleman, sententiously.

Colonel Jackpotts saw that it was no use making a scene. He gave one vindictive look at Mr. Persimmon, and then the Colonel saw that that gentleman's hand was in what in America is termed the "sly pocket of his pants." (In America, when a gentleman's hand is in this position it is generally grasping a revolver.)

"Then, darn me blue," said the colonel, "if you ain't busted me between you; cuss you!" Then, in his rage, he swallowed his quid, and his language became unprintable.

I carefully packed up all the money on the table in the note case of Party's popper.

"You might like to see that there are only five cards in my hand," I remarked triumphantly. I exhibited my five worthless cards face upward. I had "bluffed" Colonel Jabez Jackpotts.

There is no more to tell. I married Parthenia. Party's popper is a very wealthy man. I am not anxious to meet Colonel Jackpotts.—St. James Gazette.

A THUNDERBOLT MAKES GLASS.

How the Tube Known as Fulgurite Is Manufactured

"Did you ever see the diameter of a lightning-flash measured?" asked a geologist recently. "Well, here is the case which once inclosed a flash of lightning, fitting it exactly, so that you can just see how big it was. This is called a 'fulgurite' or 'lightning hole,' and the material it is made of is glass. I will tell you how it was manufactured, though it took only a fraction of a second to turn it out.

"When a bolt of lightning strikes a bed of sand it plunges downward into the sand for a distance less or greater, transforming simultaneously into glass the silicia in the material through which it passes. Thus, by its great heat, it forms at once a glass tube of precisely its own size. Now and then such a tube, known as a 'fulgurite,' is found and dug up. Fulgurites have been followed into the sand by excavation for nearly thirty feet. They vary in interior diameter from the size of a quill to three inches or more, according to the 'bore of the flash.

"But fulgurites are not alone produced in sand; they are found also in solid rock, though very naturally of slight depth and frequently existing merely as a thin, coating on the surface. Such fulgurites occur in astonishing abundance on the summit of Little Ararat, in Armenia. The rock is soft and so porous that blocks a foot long can be obtained, perforated in all directions by little tubes filled with bottle-green glass formed from the fused rock. There is a small specimen in the National Museum which has the appearance of having been bored by the teredo, the holes made by the worm subsequently filled with glass.

Some wonderful fulgurites were found by Humboldt on the high Nevada de Toluca in Mexico. Masses of the rock were covered with a thin layer of green glass. Its peculiar shimmer in the sun led Humboldt to ascend the precipitous peak at the risk of his life."—N. Y. Journal.

What Was Wanted.

The ability to state a case so clearly as to render misunderstanding impossible is a valuable gift, but, unfortunately, all persons do not possess it. A political convention was being held for the purpose of nominating a candidate for an important office.

The district was a close one, and the necessity of selecting a popular man was thoroughly recognized. A speaker had just nominated a personal friend for the position, and in an elaborate eulogy had presented in glowing terms his manifold merits, especially emphasizing his great services upon the field of battle, as well as in the pursuits of peace.

After he had finished, a voice was heard in the rear of the room. "Well, what we want is a man that will run the best."

In an instant the orator was again upon his feet.

"If you think this convention can find anybody who can run better than the gentleman I have nominated, I point you once more to his well-known war record."

Automatic Gas Shut-off.

The principle of the expansion and contraction of a metallic loop made of German silver and steel when exposed to varying temperatures has been utilized for automatically shutting off gas when it has been blown out, instead of being turned off in the usual way. One end of the loop, which is adjusted close to the gas flame, is free, while the other is secured to the fixture. A valve controlling the gas is attached to the free end, and when the gas is burning the valve is open and the gas freely escapes. If, however, the gas is blown out, the loop will quickly cool and contract, and the valve will shut off the gas. The device is exceedingly simple and it responds quickly to the change in temperature.

FISH AS FOOD

The Idea That the Eating of Fish Produces Brain Power Erroneous.

Though "fish days," as they were once understood, are now optional, the question discussed by a writer in Temple Bar under the above heading, is still a very important one. Regarding the properties of fish as food there is still much to learn. The working classes entertain usually an utter contempt for it, and very few of them go beyond "a bloater for breakfast," or "two pennyworth of shrimps or winkles" as a supplement for their Sunday afternoon tea. "One popular fallacy," says the author, "in connection with fish may be noticed—namely, the oft-repeated assertion that the eating of that particular food increases brain power! No one who has studied the subject can possibly believe the assertion. A man might eat a huge portion of fish every day of his life, and on the day of his death, if the quantity of phosphorus (the brain invigorator) consumed were to become visible, it would not amount to more than might suffice to tip a couple of lucifer matches. Communities have existed that lived almost solely on fish, but these Ichthyophagists were certainly not famous for intellectual attainments. Nor are our fisher villages, in many of which much fish is presumably consumed, the seats of any great amount of brain power. None of our fisher folks are remarkable for genius, or even for what is called common sense; their views of life and its responsibilities being shrouded in a haze of superstition, which they lack sufficient strength of mind to see through." It is interesting, too, to note that in this expert's opinion "fishing is a profitable occupation. The sea is vast, no seed or manure is required to force the great harvest, which brings to the fish captors at first hand a sum of six millions sterling, and in all probability costs the consumer thrice that sum. No toll is exacted for leave to fish, no rent is required for permission to gather the harvest of the sea; the teeming waters of the mighty deep are free to all who choose to cast their lines or nets into them."

ARSENIC AND AMMONIA.

The slow absorption of many poisons changes in some more or less modified form the complexion; but arsenic and ammonia show their effect about as quickly as any. The popular belief that arsenic clears the complexion has led many silly women to kill themselves with it in small, continued doses.

It produces a waxy, ivory-like appearance of the skin during a certain stage of the poisoning, but its terrible after effects have become too well known to make it of common use as a cosmetic.

The effects of ammonia upon the complexion are directly the opposite to that of arsenic. The first symptom of ammonia poisoning which appears among those who work in ammonia factories is a discoloration of the skin of the nose and forehead. This gradually extends over the face until the complexion has a stained, blotched, and unsightly appearance. With people who take ammonia into their systems in smaller doses, as with their water or food, these striking symptoms do not appear so soon. The only effect of the poison that is visible for a time is a general unwholesomeness and sallowness of the complexion.

Many people are slowly absorbing ammonia poison without knowing it. The use of ammonia in the manufactures has greatly increased of late, and it is unquestionably used as an adulterant in certain food preparations. Official analysis have plainly showed its use even in such cheap articles of every day consumption as baking powders. The continued absorption of ammonia in even minute quantities as an adulterant in food is injurious not merely from its effect upon the complexion, but because it destroys the coating of the stomach and causes dyspepsia and kindred evils.

Professor Long of Chicago, is authority for the statement that, if to fifty million parts of water there is one part of ammonia, the water is dangerous.

A King's Ambition.

The little King of Spain, Alfonso XIII,, has his boyish ambitions, it seems, even though he is a king. He is now five years old, and is no longer a "baby king." Recently, it is related by a correspondent at Madrid, the celebrated sculptor, Senor Querol, was engaged to make a statue of the young king.

The sculptor had great difficulty in finding a pose for his subject which should be at once spirited and natural, and sat one day in a brown study, regarding the boy as he looked out at the window.

All at once the sound of a band of music was heard on the street. The king sprang up, and brought his hand to his forehead in the military salute.

"The flag, sir! the flag!" the boy exclaimed, "Salute it!"

The sculptor had found the pose he sought, and made his statue represent the king in the act of saluting his country's flag.

As he was at work, the boy asked the artist:

"Are you going to make me big?"

"The statue will represent your majesty a little larger than you are," said Senor Querol.

"Well," said the five-year-old, "I want you to make me very big, with a long moustache!"

BILLIARD BALLS

A New Industry Discovered by Thieves.

It was Jack Quinn, alias Jack Larrigan. His companion was Tom Larrigan, his brother, who can claim some aliases himself when he feels like it. Indeed, according to police records, Thomas has served his time for petty larceny.

The boys are under arrest this time for the boldest and most successful raid on billiard balls ever made in the history of this city. It may not be generally known that the spheres that men like to punch around with cues cost lots of money. When the Larrigans learned that the balls were worth from $25 to $35 a set of four, they started into wholesale business at once. It is estimated that within the past three months they have robbed at least a hundred saloons, taking an average of $20 worth of billiard balls each. If they had broken the same number of safes it could not have caused the police any more trouble, for half of the hundred saloon proprietors have made a practice of visiting the chief three times a week and giving him a scolding.

It was a very clever scheme they worked, says the San Francisco Examiner. Being well dressed and very smooth, they had no difficulty in getting the best set of balls in any billiard room they visited. The two would then get into a very interesting game on the table farthest from the bar. When the end was coming one of them would walk up to the barkeeper and tell him to mix a couple of mint juleps or something of that sort. While the man of the apron was working about his bottles and the young man who ordered was waiting at the bar the confederate would run out the game and pocket the billiard balls. Then the two Larrigans would drink together, pay for the liquor and the billiard game and walk out.

Some ten complaints were lodged at the chief's office before a man gave a good description of the thieves. Detective Rodgers went on a hunt and recovered fifty billiard balls in pawnshops, but could not find either of the Larrigan boys.

While Judge Worley was holding court recently Rodgers walked in to take a look, and on the very front bench among the spectators were the young men he had been looking for so long. The detective hurried out and returned with a saloonkeeper who had been robbed. When the two boys were listening wide-mouthed to some testimony Rodgers pointed at them.

"Are those the men?" he asked.

"The very fellows," was the reply.

"I thought so," said the detective, and with that he walked up in front of the Judge and grabbed the brothers. They resisted, but were overpowered, dragged out of the court room and lodged down stairs.

RUNAWAY ENGINES.

The Old Ben Franklin Stopped in Its Mad Career by Oiling the Tracks.

The old Long Island railroad had a single track, with numerous switches and turnings. One dark night when the conductor was taking three passenger-cars through to Greenport, after traveling six or eight miles he noticed the headlight of a locomotive in his rear. What could it mean? The locomotive was gaining rapidly upon him. He ordered the engineer to put on more steam. Then followed a wild chase through the night. Pursuer and pursued tore along at the highest speed. Showers of sparks fell from the wheels. Everybody on the cars believed that the engineer of the pursuing locomotive was either drunk or asleep. At last a bright idea struck the fireman. He remembered that a locomotive can make no progress on greasy rails. The contents of two huge cans of kerosene were poured upon the track. The device proved successful. Soon the headlight of the pursuer grew dim in the distance. The train was stopped and backed up to solve the mystery.

A laughable sight was revealed.

There stood the old Ben Franklin," puffing and snorting and pawing like a wild bull, the driving-wheels buzzing around on the greased track like all possessed, but not moving an inch.

Sanding the track they bore down on the old machine. Not a sign of engineer or fireman was visible. There was a full head of steam on, but the fires were getting low.

Pushing back to the next station with the runaway engine, the conductor was there handed a dispatch informing him that the "Ben Franklin" had broken loose, and ordering him to switch it off at Lakeland and wreck it.

Locomotive runaways are not uncommon. Two engines once collided on a track of the Boston and Maine Railroad in Tewksbury. The shock opened the throttle-valve of one of them. The engineer had already jumped down, and off went the locomotive like a shot, headed for Lowell. Reaching the end of the track at the Lowell station, it overturned the bunker as though it were a wisp of straw, went plowing through the floor of the station for a distance of seventy-five feet, and entered the express office. Crashing through the partition that separated this office from the station quarters, it wrecked one end of the baggage-room in passing. At last it grated its head against the brick wall which adjoined the public sidewalk, and had torn out quite a section before the floor gave way. Down plunged the engine into the basement, emitting clouds of steam and smoke, but now comparatively harmless.—Newark Journal.

DID NOT KNOW HIM.

Amusing Incident Caused by a Beard.

A writer in the New York Star comments upon the bewildering change in a man's appearance which is often brought about by shaving the beard or letting it grow, and cites a story related to him by a lawyer. The lawyer was then wearing a heavy beard, which he had been cultivating, as he said "since last October."

The other day I was riding on the front platform of a street-car, as I was smoking, when I saw a cousin of mine, with her husband and baby, get aboard. I had not seen her since the day she was married in the summer of 1888, and had never met her husband except on the night of the wedding. At that time I had only a moustache.

When they were seated in the car I nodded to her, but she did not return the salution. I repeated it, but still there was no response. Evidently she did not recognize me, but for the fun of the thing I kept on nodding and smiling.

She began to be disconcerted, and pretty soon I saw her whispering to her husband, who at once rose and made his way to the rear platform, where he spoke excitedly to the conductor. That worthy came through the car, and, opening the front door, said to me:

"You must either stop insulting the lady in the car or get off. Her husband has complained of your conduct."

I assured him that I had no wish to insult any one, and as he began to get excited I passed into the car, and, taking hold of a strap, leaned over the lady and said:

"Why, Minnie, how are you?"

She looked at me for a moment, and then exclaimed.

"Cousin Eddy! How do you do? I didn't know you with your whiskers."

The car was pretty full, and as all hands had understood that I was complained of, there was a general laugh at this unexpected turn of affairs.

WHAT KIND OF BIRD WAS IT?

Two Men Made a Bet in City Hall Park and Didn't Find Out.

There was a new bird in City Hall Park recently. Its first notes were heard about 4 o'clock, just as the lucky dogs began to get away from the banks and law offices and to ride uptown in the Broadway cars along with the nice girls that had been downtown to "see papa" or "brother George." Opinions varied among the pedestrians along Broadway as to the nature of the bird. The chirping was shrill but rather faint, and when one man pointed to the bough of the Ulm domesticus and insisted that the little songster was there, another was equally insistent that the piping came from the leafy boughs of the Fraxmus excelsior further on.

One by one a crowd gathered, only to disintegrate and go off with a rush when their patient eyes failed to discover a feather or a wing, scarlet, yellow, or dingy brown. At last there were left only the two who first heard the chirruping, each still with an ear aloft.

"It's a sparrow," said one.

"It's an oriole or I'll eat my hat!"

"Impossible," said the first.

"I was born within four feet of an oriole's nest. I'd orter know," said the second.

"Why, an oriole goes 'chip-chip-chirrip!' "

"I beg your pardon. An oriole goes chirrp-chirp-ch-ch-chirrp.' "

"Why, my dear man—"

"Excuse me, sir!—"

"I'll bet you a box of cigars."

"I'll take it. An oriole goes 'chirrp.

Just then the oriole came into view—a tawny head, with a long beak, black body, and lavender legs.

"Chirrp, chirp, ch-ch-chirrp! Here's de fina bird wistle, fiva centa piece. Ch-ch-chirrip!"

When one man has a little prejudice against another, suspicion is very busy in coining resemblances.

THE FARM AND FIELD.

INTERESTING SUBJECTS FOR RURAL READING.

Preservation of Manure--Plants that Flavor Butter--Hilling Potatoes--Depth of Good Soil.

Preservation of Manure.

The June bulletin (No. 32) of the New York Agricultural Experiment Station contains a great deal of suggestive information with regard to various kinds of fertilizers. In the pages devoted to the barnyard manures there are two or three sections relating to the fermentation of such manures, and the proper methods of caring for them to prevent the loss of fertalizing constituents. That there is a vast amount of indifference—not to say ignorance—among farmers with regard to the losses they suffer in consequence of the heating or leaching of their stores of manure is too painfully evident to those who have looked into the matter.

But the conditions under which farming is now conducted in this country in all the older States, and even in many of the newer sections, are such that wiser methods are becoming imperative. Farmers cannot longer afford to cart "the ghosts of their manure piles," as an English writer expressed it, into their fields, for the stored up fertility which gave them fair crops in spite of the mockery of fertilizing material they laboriously applied to them is largely exhausted. They must learn to husband all their fertilizing resources and utilize them to the best advantage in order to maintain unimpaired the fruitfulness of their farms.

The suggestions of the agricultural station bulletin are, therefore, of great value, even if they seem trite to those who have learned, years ago, that waste in the barnyard means poverty in the barn.

There are two principal ways, it says, in which stable manures commonly loses some of its fertilizing constituents—first, by improper methods of fermentation, and, second, by leaching. In regard to the first point, more or less nitrogen is lost by allowing manure to ferment without sufficient moisture; especially is this apt to be true in the case of horse manure, which decomposes very rapidly. A strong odor coming from a manure heap indicates that wasteful fermentation is taking place.

This source of loss can be avoided by keeping the manure heap moistened with water or by sprinkling land plaster about the stables to be mixed constantly with the accumulations or by using dry earth as an absorbent. Only nitrogen compounds can be lost by vaporization. By leaching there will be a loss of not only nitrogen compounds, but of potash and phosphoric acid also.

The common method of storing farm-yard manure for several months under the eaves of the barn often, if not generally, results in a loss of one-half or more of the fertilizing constituents by leaching; and, moreover, the materials thus leached out by rain are the more easily soluble portions of the manure, and hence the more valuable portions.

Another point of great importance in connection with the preservation of stable manure is the saving of the urine. The common practice is to let this go to waste. But, as shown in one of the stables of the Bulletin, the liquid is, in most instances, much more valuable than the solid portions. Thus the solid fresh excrement of cattle contains only half as much nitrogen and about one-fifth as much potash as the fresh urine.

The difference between the solid manure and the urine of the horse is greater still, while the fertilizing constituents of the urine are entirely soluble, and therefore more readily available for plant food than those of solid excrement. To let the former go to waste, therefore, while utilizing the latter is much as if an orchardist should carefully pick out for sale the poorest of his fruit and leave the rest to rot on the trees.

The main object in caring for barnyard manure is to prevent the loss of compounds containing nitrogen, potash and phosphoric acid. When the manure is kept for some time before being carted afield, the three principal points to be observed are these:

1. Save the liquid manure by means of litter, using in addition land plaster or some form of dry earth, such as peat or muck.
2. Keep the manure heap in a sufficiently moist condition.
3. Protect carefully from leaching by rain.

With regard to the first point it is suggested that the use of too much litter diminishes the relative value of manure and add to the cost of handling; but enough litter should be used not only to absord and retain the urine, but also to absord any ammonia that may be formed in the process of decomposition.

Hilling Potatoes.

Experiments made by us, 20 years ago and more, showed that the common and almost universal practice of drawing the earth up in small hills around potato plants was attended with considerable loss. The practice was founded on the erroneous supposition that all the roots and tubers were confined within a narrow space of comparatively few inches around each plant, and that a deep bed of earth in a narrow hillock was just what was wanted. On riding through the country most of the potato fields and gardens are seen still to continue the practice.

The great mistake thus made may be observed by digging down a few inches in the spaces between rows. It will be found that while the plants are still young, and before the tubers have formed or grown to any size, the horizontal roots have met and crossed each other between and in the three foot spaces. By hilling the plants, the earth must be scraped or plowed away from these spaces, and the horizontal roots cut off or laid bare. This treatment will necessarily reduce the growth of the tubers, which although near the center of the hill, are fed by the roots.

The experiment is well worth trying. Select three or four more, and let the soil be well cultivated and kept mellow and flat. Count the bushels of each when dug, and it will be found that those from the flat rows have from ten to twenty per cent more potatoes.

There may sometimes be very peculiar conditions of the soil—shallow soil or rocky, or otherwise which may modify the result; but for common ground, plowed at a good depth and planted deep enough, there is but one result. We observe that the Michigan station has modified this test by placing manure between the rows, where the long horizontal roots could feed from it with better returns than by manuring in, under or over the hill.—Albany Cultivator.

Plants Tnat Flavor Butter.

A grass which should be the dairyman's favorite, owing to the sweet scented fragrance it communicates to the milk, is the Vernal grass (anthoxanthum odoratum). It springs up early in the spring, flowers and scents the air with its fragrance. As a grass for exclusive feeding it will not rank high, but when mixed properly with the other more nutritious grasses it gives a fragrance to the whole mass which is very delightful.

No grass probably flavors milk, cream and butter so directly and noticeably as this sweet scented Vernal grass, and where it is found in abundance in the fields growing along with the other varieties, the butter made from that section has a distinguishing and exquisite taste. When this grass is mowed and stowed away in the silo with other grasses it gives a splendid milk food for winter feeding. On large dairy farms it is well worth the trouble to scatter some of the seeds of the Vernal grass in the pastures. The result in the flavor of the milk and butter will soon be noticable. Where fancy butter is made a specialty this grass is an essential to the pastures.

The fragrance of the grass is due to the presence of gum benzoin or benzoic acid, which can be dissolved in cold water. Butter washed in water in which the grasses have been soaking will lose its rancidity to a large extent. Ensilage butter is often destitute of true flavor, and it can only be flavored by artificial methods or by adding some such fragrant grass to the silo which will impart its sweetness to the milk before it leaves the cows.—E. P. Smith in American Cultivator.

Depth of Good Soil.

The opinions of farmers differ, though not more widely than the facts on which they are based, as to the depth that soil may be profitably cultivated. In the best soils plant food is found deeper than the plow can ever go. This, however, is mainly mineral. Vegetable matters collect near the surface. If they are deep, as they sometimes are, the lower portions are generally filled with stagnant water. Some settlers on black muck soil in the west thought they had secured land of inexhaustible fertility, mainly because it was black to a great depth. They found after a while that however deep their muck beds, only the part that could be thoroughly dried during the growing season was of any use to them. What such land needs most is thorough drainage. As soon as it gets this, however, the muck bed becomes thinner, as its carbon burns by exposure to sun and air. Then comes the severest test. If the original soil is deficit in mineral plant food the lacking elements must soon be supplied. But whether poor or rich in mineral plant food, supplies of potash and phosphate will be needed. However poor the vegetable matter may be, its decomposition will liberate ammonia enough to go a long way toward supplying grain crops, provided phosphate is furnished. But wherever the subsoil is sandy, potash is also probably needed. Wood ashes are nearly always beneficial to muck lands, as the caustic potash they contain hastens decomposition of vegetable food, besides making phosphate also more available.—Correspondent New York Tribune.

Truck Farming

This industry, according to a bulletin recently issued by the census office at Washington, has assumed surprising proportions. Truck farming is considered by the statistician as distinct from market gardening. The former is carried on in favored localities at a distance from market, water and rail transportation being necessary, while the latter is conducted near local markets, the grower of vegetables using his own team for transporting his products direct to either the retailer or consumer. Upward of $100,000,000 are investad in this industry in the United States, the annual products reaching a value of $76,517,155 on the farms after paying freights and commissions, realized upon 534,440 acres of land. There are employed in this industry 216,765 men, 9,254 women, and 14,874 children, aided by 75,866 horses and mules and $8,971,206 70 worth of implements.

SHAKESPEARE IN AMERICA.

He Is More Popular Here Than In Any Other Country.

An exceedingly interesting and exhaustive article upon the Shakespeare Year appeared in a recent issue of the Birmingham Daily Post, in England, which, although unsigned, is undoubtedly the work of the indefatigable and accomplished "Shakespearean," Samuel Timmins. The article comprises a survey of all the contributions to literature and criticism and all forms of Shakespearean activity during the year in all parts of the world, and the copious references to America are of especial value, because nowhere else, so far as we know, is such a careful and thorough statement accessible.

It appears that the number of American pilgrims to the birthplace, home and grave of Shakespeare at Stratford far surpasses that from other countries. There were probably not fewer than twenty thousand American visitors during the last year, and every year there are more. The article pays just tribute to the American editors, specifying Richard Grant White, whose "Shakespeare's Scholar," in 1854, introduced the active modern interest of this country in the poet's works. Dr. Howard Furness' Variorum" is well called "the greatest of all editions of Shakespeare's plays," and Dr. W. J. Wolfe's article refuting the "cryptogram" theory of Mr. Donnelly the article holds to be conclusive. Preston Johnson's theory of Hamlet as James I. does not escape the eye of the author, who pronounces the claim "not proved."

The labors of the New York and Philadelphia Shakespeare societies are mentioned with great commendation. The Shakespearana, a serial publication issued by them, is described as one "which America was first to establish, and which Shakespeare's own land has not tried to rival or surpass." Alvey A. Adee, of Washington is called the article "perhaps the most learned among Americans on all questions of the English drama," Chicago proposes to erect a Shakespeare hall including a theatre, library, and museum, and the picture of American activity in the study of Shakespeare, and not as Bacon, must fill the mind of Mr. Donnelly with dismay.

HOW TO TRAVEL COMFORTABLY.

Hints About Handling Clothing and Toilet Articles in a Sleeper.

In taking a long journey it is well to make oneself as comfortable as possible, especially at night. When taking your place in the sleeping-car berth, do not, for fear of various emergencies, which seldom arise, attempt to sleep in all your clothes. Undress sufficiently to be at perfect ease in any position you may assume during sleep. This freedom of lungs and limbs will assure you rest at least, even if you fail to sleep. In wintertime always carry a light woolen wrapper to avoid colds.

You should have a neat little case or bag, of linen into which you slip your purse, jewelry, hairpins, etc., and put this under your pillow in the corner nearest the window. In the rack or net which hangs above you place all small articles of apparel. You will then know, on awaking, just where to put your hand on any thing you wish to find.

If you wake and go early to the dressing-room you may make a complete and refreshing toilet before the other folks are up. Have in your satchel all appliances, such as soap and tooth-brush in celluloid cases, a sponge in its bag of oiled silk, brushes, combs, whisk, etc., etc. Be sure to provide your own towels.

The dress can be well brushed and hung up till needed on a convenient hook. Carry also a bottle of lavender or Florida water and pour some of this into the bowl. It rests and refreshes one wonderfully.

After this careful toilet and a good breakfast, served hot, you can stand with but slight additional fatigue a second day's journey.

So much seems to be provided for our comfort and enjoyment during the day while traveling that it seems necessary to have thought for the night only, as the nights rest or unrest will most always make or mar the day before us.—Housekeeper's Weekly.

How Insects Breathe.

If we take any moderately large insect, say a wasp or a hornet, we can see even with the naked eye, that a series of small, spot-like marks run along the side of the body. These apparent spots, which are eighteen or twenty in number, are in fact the apertures through which air is admitted into the system, and are generally formed in such a manner that no extraneous matter can by any possibility find entrance. Sometimes, says the Lutheran observer, they are furnished with a pair of horny caps, which can be opened and closed at the will of the insect; in other cases they are densely fringed with stiff interlacing bristles forming a filter, which allows air, and air alone, to pass; but the apparatus, of whatever character it may be, is so wonderfully perfect in its action that it has been found impossible to injure the body of a dead insect with even so subtle a medium as spirits of wine, although the subject was first immersed in the fluid and then placed beneath the receiver of an air pump. The apertures in question communicate with two large breathing tubes, which extend the entire length of the body. From these main tubes are given off innumerable branches, which run in all directions and continually divide and sub-divide, until a wonderfully intricate network is formed, pervading every part of the structure and penetrating even to the antennæ.

Some Curious Legal Nuisances.

The following are some of the alleged nuisances for which injunctions and damages have been asked from sympathetic courts and juries: In a recent English case an enthusiastic amateur played daily eight hours on a violoncello and on Sundays a little longer some times. To add to the misery caused, the player lived in a flat. The judge before whom the case came decided that three hours was long enough for any human being to play on a violoncello and the injunction issued.

In a case before the Court of Common Pleas some time ago in New York a person was brought up for trundling in a carriage over-head his teething baby, both by night and day. The judge, who must have been a married man, held that the noise was not unreasonable and refused to interfere.

In another English case a chime of bells at Deptford was not allowed to ring because the noise was offensive to a majority of the property-owners in the vicinity.

The newspapers recently mentioned the sad case of a discharged chorister who took a horrible revenge on the congregation by sitting in a pew and purposely singing out of tune. Whether he was indicted or not for disturbing public worship does not appear.—Medical Journal.

A Strong Bright Light Beneficial.

One very great mistake which people make is not using enough light. There is a popular delusion that a good light hurts the eyes. A good, strong, bright light is almost always the proper thing. Even in cases of weak, sore, or inflamed eyes should at such times have as much light as can possibly be borne, and the cure will go on all the more rapidly. But for the eyes that are not sore or inflamed, the way to keep them well, and to increase their strength, is to give them all the light possible. The brighter the light, the more the eye will be developed and strengthened. Weakness and disabilities of the eyes from over-use are often seen, but a good, bright, strong light does not usually do any harm. It tends to do good, create health, and give strength.

Here is something from Mr. Frank A. Hale, proprietor of the De Witt House, Lewiston, and the Tontine Hotel, Brunswick, Me. Hotel men meet the world as it comes and goes, and are not slow in sizing people and things up for what they are worth. He says that he has lost a father and several brothers and sisters from Pulmonary Consumption, and is himself frequently troubled with colds, and he often coughs enough to make him sick at his stomach. Whenever he has taken a cold of this kind he uses Boschee's German Syrup, and it cures him every time. Here is a man who knows the full danger of lung troubles, and would therefore be most particular as to the medicine he used. What is his opinion? Listen! "I use nothing but Boschee's German Syrup, and have advised, I presume, more than a hundred different persons to take it. They agree with me that it is the best cough syrup in the market." ⓓ

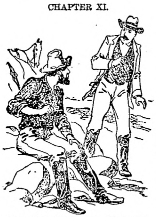
Mrs. Hart jerked down the shade with a quick exclamation at her rashness, and Royal caught the silk from her hand and replaced it over her eyes. She submitted, laughing softly all the while, and paying not the faintest heed to their reproaches.

"I have seen! I have seen!" she kept murmuring with exultation.

After a moment or two she said, in a different voice:

"How changed you are, John! Quite like a different man. I never should have known you in the world."

CHAPTER XI.



"Blessed if I don't believe it's broke."

For miles out from a thriving city of the west a wagon track leads into the mountains; not into the heart of the adjacent mining district, for there the plethora of ore is great enough to require speedier methods of disgorgement than can be furnished by mule teams, but back into the wilderness of the ranges which rise crest on crest, summit above summit, and melt and blend in the violets and purples of illimitable distance. The road, little used in later years for heavy traffic, has become scarcely more than an old trail, but affords a pleasant, if circuitous, route to some of the isolated mining camps hidden away in the canyons.

The city lies in a gulch, which it has outgrown, and from which it has thrust itself upward on the hills and outward into the valley into which the gulch opens, growing naturally, as a crustacean grows, and splitting and casting its shell. It is a fair city to look upon, with long, straight streets and wide boulevards planted with cottonwoods and other shade trees and bordered by beautiful homes in which are garnered love, hope, enterprise, and frequently unusual culture. Back of the city rise the mountains of the main range, holding treasures of gold under exteriors made rugged by rock and chasm and somber with the gloom of primeval forests of pine and fir.

Royal, returning from a mining camp whither he had been summoned to mitigate the results of a misunderstanding which had ended tumultuously, rode quietly along the old trail, letting his horse regulate the pace. He was tired and a trifle depressed, for there had been no letter from the east for many days and he felt anxious—quite without reason, he continually assured himself, for the last report had been favorable, but the emotions are mutinous subjects, so he kept on feeling anxious in defiance both of reason and of reiteration.

As they came out on a plateau above the city Royal pulled up his horse and sat gazing down upon it and letting his thought absorb the beauty of the scene and revel in its promise. He was, comparatively, a newcomer to the place, his residence only covering a period of seven or eight years, but he took pride in it, gloried in its enterprise, its wealth, its energy and progress. The story of its birth and growth was of interest to him, and he used frequently to entrap that embodiment of legends, the "oldest inhabitant," into spinning long yarns of the days when the town was but a handful of rough mining shanties and men drew their supplies from nature's storehouse round about or went lacking; and of those earlier days when all had been unbroken solitude, the haunt of elk and bear and lesser wild creatures, until two miners, working northward, lured by tales of diggings of fabulous richness in the Kootanie country, had camped in the gulch one night and there decided that their supply of food was too short to admit of their going farther.

The circumstance which at the time appeared to defeat all their calculations eventually developed into the very keystone of their fortunes, for the men, in despair of getting away, fell to digging where they were, and stuck at it pluckily, working with more hope and luck than knowledge. The goddess of chance justified their faith in her and guided them to a find the fame whereof went abroad through the land and swelled with its going, so that before the lucky miners had learned to wear their good fortune with ease the world, or that portion of it which deals in mines, was about their ears and clamorous to share it.

The nucleus of the city—the rough old log shanties—still stood away up the gulch, the abode of Chinamen and vagrants, on whom, for various incompetencies, Dame Fortune persistently turned her back. In the first year of his coming, when the spell of the place had been fresh upon him, Royal had been fond of poking about in the old town and tracking out the evolution of the "city fathers."

He had made his home in the place because the sister next him in age, and his special favorite, had married a man of the place and was solicitous to have him settle near her; in addition to which the town appeared to offer inducements to a man of his profession. He liked the place and, probably because of that liking, had prospered in it—the variety and vigor of the life formed a fit accompaniment to the impulses which dominated his nature.

During those eight years his parents had died, his old home in the southwest had been broken up, and the members of his family scattered far and wide. Apart from the sister who lived here, and in whose life he was of necessity a [illegible] ance, Royal [illegible] domestic ties. Occasionally, when work was slack or his physical condition disordered, a sense of loneliness would settle around Royal like a gray cloud, and the longing for a life apart from that of his profession would cling to his spirit like the vapor of which the cloud is formed. His life was full, but not full enough; he cared for his profession, taking vivid pride in its every branch, but it only satisfied his brain, while his heart stood empty. Having the intellectual life in full measure, he craved the emotional life—the strength and virility of the man demanded fuller exercises and larger opportunities.

Particularly had this been the case since his return from the East the previous winter. The knowledge that he had a wife and should have a home made him restive, because, as yet, he was debarred enjoyment of either good. His eyes, as he gazed away into the distance, had a wistful look, his figure drooped in the saddle, and, involuntarily, his face turned eastward.

A noise close at hand caused both horse and man to start and stand at attention. Near the roadside was a pile of dirt and rubbish thrown up by some sanguine and unsuccessful prospector in years gone by. The noise appeared to come from behind it, and had a curiously human sound. Royal touched his horse with the spur and rode around the heap to reconnoiter. On the farther side, near the edge of the old excavation, sat a brawny looking man, in miner's garb, rocking himself backward and forward, and muttering or swearing in a sort of crooning undertone. His back was toward Royal, but at the sound of the horse's step he glanced sideways over his shoulder. Then he slouched forward again, and Royal, from the elevation of the saddle, could see that he had one leg drawn up and was feeling it slowly from knee to ankle.

"Good day, mate," Royal called, with the ready freemasonry of the frontier. "Is anything the matter?"

"Blessed if I don't believe it's broke," the miner made answer.

"What's broken?"

"My leg."

Royal was off his horse in an instant, and went to the man's side.

"How'd you manage that?"

The miner's face was pallid, underneath its tan and dinginess, and his eyes showed that his pain was considerable; but his mouth twisted into a quizzical smile as he answered:

"I guess I must ha' been pretty full last night and missed the trail gwine into town. Sumthin' seems to ha' happened, anyhow. I come to myself a while ago in the bottom o' that infernal trap"—indicating the hole—"sorter screwed round, an' mighty uncomfortable, an' nary notion inside my skull how I got thar."

Royal dropped his rein and came to the man's side. The horse moved off a step or two and snuffed the ground, nosing the half dried grass daintily.

"He'll stand," Royal said, noting the man's expression. "Now let's have a look at the leg. I'm a doctor."

He cut away the miner's long boot and ripped up the leg of his trousers. The leg was broken in two places, and the bones grated as Royal moved the limb about; the bruised flesh was swollen and much discolored.

"It's a bad job, ain't it, doctor?" questioned the man impersonally.

"Yes. It's a good many hours since the mischief was done, you see, and the leg's swollen. It's pretty painful, isn't it?"

The miner nodded.

"'Tain't so bad as 'twas whenst I was scramblin' out'n that hole," he observed. "I had to let her swing—wantin' my hands for climbin'. That let the blood down, an' I felt like I'd got a bootful o' hell fire, an' every time she struck ag'in the rocks (an' she struck pretty often) seemed like the devil had the poker an' was chunkin' her up."

Royal had the leather leg laid straight along the ground, and was busy cutting the upper from the sole of the man's boot. He had lotions and bandages in his pockets, having carried a supply with him to the camp.

"Gwine to set her, doctor?"

"No. I haven't the proper appliances, and there isn't a stick in sight fit to make a splinter. I'm going to make a cradle of this bootleg and bandage it up a bit, and see if I can't get you into town to my office. Do you think you can ride?"

"I guess so. 'Twon't be no worse'n settin' here an' cussin' for comp'ny while you ride into town an' send arter me."

He evidently considered that, Royal having laid his hand to the case, he himself was exempt from further concern about arrangements.

Royal bound up the leg in such fashion as to prevent further mischief, administered a drug to allay the pain and helped his patient to mount. It was not accomplished without a groan or two and a deepening of the gray pallor, but he was a plucky soul and used to rough experiences, so he made the best of it with a fortitude that won on Royal. Nor was he deficient in gratitude or a sense of courtesy, which he evinced by a word or two of thanks and regret for the trouble he was giving.

"If I'd knowed how drunk I was I'd ha' staid in camp," he remarked penitently. "The boys had a birthday up thar, or ruther a kid from ole Virginny had, an' he's a green hand an' 'lowed we'd all got to drink luck to him. An' we done it, an' then drunk luck to all hands; so time we got aroun' the camp I guess I'd more on board then I could carry."

To Royal the conclusion admitted of no doubt.

"I'd promised Mollie I'd come down this week," the man went on, "an' 'twas on my mind even whenst I got drinkin' with the fellows, an' sort'r stuck by me, for drunk as I was I started for home, not wantin' to disapp'int her."

"Your sweetheart?"

"My wife."

Royal was walking beside the horse with his hand on the rein.

"This will be a bad job for her," he observed gravely. "This sort of thing comes hard on a woman."

"We're a good bit ahead, an' own the shanty," the miner said, seeking self justification. "She needn't pester about money if I'm laid up six months." Then, more humbly: "She'll mind about my bein' drunk. She's always arter me to quit, an' I've good as promised I would a hun'ed times, but the devil gits aroun' me somehow. I don't spree nigh as much as I used to, though it looks like it hurt her so bad. She's a sensible woman, is Mollie, an' can make allowance for a fellow's not bein' game to choke off all at once. She don't bile a man to rags with temper every time he gits in trouble, nother. 'I'm sorry, Jack,' that's about all she'll say; an' she'll be sorry, too, right down close beside you, not on a house top, o' bein' better'n you. She's a rare good un, is Mollie."

The pain, combined with the action of the drug, excited his nerves and made him loquacious.

"Yes, she's a good un," he repeated, "if you deal squar' with her, that is—just go plumb to her an' own up what you've done manful, an' don't let her git knowledge o' it second hand. A woman 'll stand 'most anything from a man if so be he loves her tight an' true an' don't keep nothin' hid from her. If he doubles an' twists an' aims to kiver up his tracks she'll git it into her head he's afeard o' her, an' she'll despise him worse'n a dead buzzard."

They had entered the city. The shadows were gathering, and electric lights had begun to flame on street corners and through shop windows. Royal complied with the miner's request and took him straight to his home. It was a neat little frame building on a side street. The wife must have seen them from a window, for by the time the horse stopped she had the door open and stood ready to help Royal bring her husband in.

"It's a bad business, Mollie," he said at once, his face contorted with pain. "I got drunk ag'in an' fell in a hole, worse luck. My fault, wife."

"Yes, Jack," she answered patiently. "I'm sorry."

Then she put her arm around him and helped Royal lift him on to the bed. She was a pleasant looking woman, with a quiet voice and manner, and seemed a trifle older than her husband, and also, in some indefinable way, superior to him—due, as Royal found out later, to the fact of her mother having been a lady.

After the patient had been made comfortable, Royal took his leave, telling the woman that he would look in early the next morning. As he left the room the miner called after him:

"If ever you gets married, doctor, don't keep none o' your meanness hid from your wife. 'Twon't look nigh so low lived if you do the tellin'. Treat her squar', an' she'll make shift to forgive you a drunk now an' then. Won't she, Mollie?"

The miner's idea of the proper foundation for conjugal happiness arrested Royal's attention. It threw a new light on his own affairs. He knew himself that he had been held back from telling the story to Phyllis by other considerations than fear of her anger. She would understand that, too, of the past. But now that she was better, now that the cure was well nigh complete, continued silence would be open to misconstruction.

He had sent his horse to the stable an hour before by the ubiquitous boy who haunts street corners, and instead of going home he turned aside from the main street and walked over to a new portion of the city building out on the hills. Here the electric lights were fewer and the streets less frequented. On every hand tasteful cottages already stood in pretty yards or were in process of erection. These were homes for men whose desires and incomes were both moderate.

Royal sauntered along until he reached a corner lot on which stood a Queen Anne cottage, newly finished, and as fresh and clean as rain washed grass. The little yard had been leveled and turfed, and was inclosed by an iron railing, and two small cottonwoods had been planted near the little porch. Royal opened the gate and entered with the air of a proprietor. It was his own, the nest he had built for his Virginia mocking bird, and to which he hoped to proudly bring her when all things should be straightened out between them.

The erection and furnishing of the little home had filled the months for him and helped him over the disappointment of not going east in the spring, as he had intended. The settlement of the estate had been perforce postponed, owing to the serious illness of the executor, which incapacitated him for business. He would not have allowed that to interfere with his plans, however, but Mrs. Hart had written advising him to delay his coming until she should give the word, for Phyllis would prefer that he should not join her until she should be permanently released from a darkened room and quite herself again.

It had been worded very delicately, and the letter had been a monument to Mrs. Hart's tact and diplomacy; but to Royal it had seemed singular and had hurt him not a little. His wife did not want him, that was evident, and he had obeyed, feeling at a disadvantage, but too proud to thrust himself upon her. He had in a measure lost sight of John Royal's part in the affair, and had come to regard it as pertaining only to Phyllis and himself.

He took a key from his pocket, entered the house, and turned on the lights, passing from room to room. It was tastefully furnished, for his sister had helped him, jesting slyly the while about his obvious intention. He had told her of his love for a woman in the east, and she, knowing little, imagined much, and considered the whole affair as settled. She entered into the house plans with enthusiasm, and imparted to her husband, in the sacredness of conjugal confidence and sworn secrecy, that she believed, she truly did, that Hart would be married within the year.

One little room, opening out from the chamber and intended for his wife's special sanctum, Royal had fitted up himself, remembering faithfully all the things he had ever heard Phyllis say she liked, and arranging them for her with his own hands. He went straight to this room now, and for many moments stood and looked about, trying to imagine the change it would make when she should be sitting in the low chair by the open fireplace, which he had put in to remind her of Virginia, or resting on the sofa, which he was sure must stand just at the angle to please her, with the light of the window shaded from her eyes and a tiny table near for books or work basket. He moved about gently, like a man in a sacred place, and thought loving, reverent, loyal thoughts, as became a true man. He would not sit down nor take liberties with the place—although she had never entered it. In his mind it was her sanctuary, with which he had nothing to do until she herself should make him welcome.

He went out presently, shutting the door gently, as though afraid of disturbing some one. Then he turned off the lights, locked the door, said a word to the watchman of the square, who was outside awaiting developments, and betook himself home to his sister's house.

As he opened the door his ears were assailed with the sound of lamentation, and he discovered his youngest niece prone on her face on the hall floor. He picked her up and comforted her. The baby put her arms around his neck and nestled her wet cheek against his. As she did so a letter slipped from her apron and fell at his feet.

"What's this, Daisy?" he questioned, stooping for the letter and seeking to divert her attention.

"Zoo letty," sobbed the little one; "baby fess it to zoo, and her fallded down!"

"Poor baby! There, there, don't cry any more," turning the letter to look at the address, and slipping it in his pocket. "Jack and Jill never thought of such a thing as crying when they tumbled down and cracked their crowns. And Jill was a little tot no bigger than you," which was applicable, but not according to the text. "Come into the office and let uncle patch you up and find you something."

"Tandy?"—with a visibly brightening atmosphere.

Later he examined his letter. There were many closely written pages from Mrs. Hart: but these he laid aside, pouncing on a little note inclosed, the first he had ever had from Phyllis. It was a tiny sheet covered with a dozen lines or so in pencil, and commenced with quaint formality:

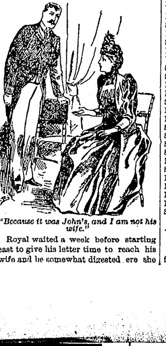
> DEAR DR. ROYAL—This is my first attempt at writing for—I am afraid to say how many years, and I am as proud as a peacock to be allowed to write at all. Have been promoted to goggling blue glasses—very enjoyable, but hideously unbecoming, which at the present juncture is of no earthly importance. Write me a long letter all to myself. I no longer need to borrow other people's eyes. And—come home soon to
>
> PHYLLIS.

It bore no faintest resemblance to a love letter, being precisely such a note as one cousin might write to another cousin; but Royal could see no fault in it. Even the formality of the opening—which he set down to coyness—pleased him, as investing him with his own identity, as it were. It had always grated on him to have her give him the dead man's name.

He touched the note with his lips, as a boy lover might have done, and slipped it into his breast pocket. It crystallized the purpose which had been held in solution for hours in his mind.

Before he slept that night he wrote a long and loving letter to his wife, containing a clear and manly statement of the whole affair, and ending with an earnest entreaty for her forgiveness and to be allowed an opportunity to win her love in return for the love with which his own heart was filled.

CHAPTER XII.



"Because it was John's, and I am not his wife."

Royal waited a week before starting east to give his letter time to reach his wife and be somewhat digested ere she

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

A. D. Wishard was at Crookston Monday.

Two representatives of the Excelsior fanning mills were in town this week. They come from St. Croix Falls, Wis., which is Johnnie Thompson's home. John, we understand, expects to be with us again during the hunting season.

Mat Skals keeps right up to the times. He has one of the neatest and most popular refreshment parlors in the city. Be in it, and call on Mat for a pleasant evening, or for wines, liquors and cigars.

The Catholic sewing Circle met this week--to-day—with Mrs. Ed Garceau.

Mrs. Joseph Smith gives a tea this afternoon.

Do you think for a moment it will do us any good to have you read "Ten Minutes to Twelve? No! Our motive is from having your pleasure at heart.

J. D. Marshall's boat house is now completed and presents a nobby appearance.

Marcus Johnson, J. D. Marshall's partner, came up from Atwater Monday a. m.

H. O. Fanning started for Red Lake via Lambert Saturday morning. Mr. Fanning represents a Michigan lumber company. His visit to the pineries is for the purpose of investigation. He is enthusiastic over the lumber outlook,and claims it to be immense. We have every facility, he says, if we have the timber. We have only 11,000,000,000, but that is some timber, as we understand it.

Ye editor took the train Friday night for Detroit. He went to St. Paul also and returned yesterday a. m.

Joe Btay has joined the base ball nine at Staples Mills.

The Norwegian Lutheran services were largely attended Sunday. A number of members were confirmed, and special exercises held in honor of the event. The pastor, Rev. Lavik, delivered a fitting discourse on the subject. The day will long be remembered and cherished by these confirmed. They are: Robert Lonson, Fritz Anderson, Clara Simenson,Gerta Gjerberg, Maria Lavik.

Wm. Zaiser made us a call Monday. Says he has seen no grasshoppers around his farm and that the grain looks fine.

Miss Eugenie LaFreniere has answered a prize Rebus which appeared in the People's Illustrated Journal, and behold the result—she has been awarded a house lot in Leroy, Marion Co., Florida. Miss Le Freniere succeeds in whatever she undertakes.

Frank E. Hunt is getting ready to put in a general line of hardware at the Thoreson building. Mr. Hunt will have a complete stock and will doubtless do a large business. He has a great number of friends among the farmers.

Mrs. August Riechel Sr. is gradually mending from her severe attack of rheumatism.

Prof. Lugger and M. E. Kirsch were in town last week. The Professor is not apprehensive of the grasshopper pest, as he states that modern methods of dealing with them are altogether too efficacious for the health of the persistent insect. There is no danger this year from grasshoppers, and if necessary the state will expend any amount of money plowing them under where eggs are laid. In Ottertail county they have been threatening for several years, but prompt action of citizens and the state government has prevented any material increase in their number.

H. O. Gjerberg is having the Commercial hotel building repaired. It needs repairing badly enough, and will be much improved in both value and appearance when the carpenters are through with it.

Druggist Schreiter still keeps the picture of that fair face within easy reach of his vision. It is time W. A. were getting to housekeeping again—high time.

Mrs. J. P. Harren received the sad intelligence that her brother had died two days after she left Spokane. He was in perfect health but two days before his death. Mrs. Harren's many friends extend their sympathy in this affliction.

Wild strawberries are not nearly as plentiful this year as last. The quantity coming to town is very scarce indeed and eager purchasers are many.

Miss Laframboise, of Gentilly, was in the city Saturday in company with Miss St. Yves.

Joseph Smith took the train Friday night for St. Paul. He will visit at Duluth and West Superior ere his return. Joe says a run down to the cities always acts like a tonic to him, and when he returns the impulse is to roll up his sleeves and do more than enough to make up for lost time.

Mr. and Mrs P. G. Falardeau started for New York last night. That's where they came from.

St. Hilaire Spectator: Dr. Watson, of Red Lake Falls, was in town on professional business yesterday. The Doctor evidently believes in going prepared for a change in the weather as we noticed he wore a buffalo coat and a straw hat.

Miss Flora St. Yves was in town Saturday on her way home to Badger Creek. Miss St. Yves has four months more to teach in her school at Gentilly. She evidently gives good satisfaction and says she likes Gentilly.

H. B. Kaufer has a new gravel walk leading from the street to his residence.

Charles Bourden scarcely stands in need of congratulations over that plump girl baby born Monday morning—he has been shaking hands with himself ever since. Both Mrs. Bourden and the baby are doing well.

Mrs. J. W. Bourden, who recently resided here, met with a serious accident at Havre, Montana, last Wednesday, falling and breaking two ribbs. Mrs.Bourden has not been in the best of health, and it is feared this accident may result seriously. Mr. Bourden is engaged in running a boarding car in Montana, and aside from this catastrophe has been doing well.

Edmund Bray drove over to Louisville Sunday in all the rain. The magnetic attraction is something wonderful.

There was no little excitement in town Tuesday night. Scraps North andSouth. Where was the marshal?

The fall of water was unusually heavy this week. The ground had been very dry. The benefit to the hay crop is immense.

E. A. Moran started Tuesday evening for a trip through Iowa, Illinois and Wisconsin. Ed will return in time to put up hay before the season is over.

Thomas Blair has been awarded the contract to build the foundation for the new schoolhouse. This includes the excavation for basement. Work was begun Monday and will be rapidly pushed.

The country home of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Mercier was the scene of a jolly birthday party Saturday night. The event was in honor of Mr. Mercier's fifty fourth birthday anniversary and was a surprise to him. Among the guests was Adam Schmitz and his accordeon. The rooms were cleared and dancing indulged in. Refreshments in abundance were brought by the guests and a delicious repast served. About two o'clock the party broke up, wishing Mr. Mercier many more hale and hearty years of life.

Xavier Tessier, who resides in Lake Pleasant township, will this week start for Montreal. Mr. Tessier's visit to Canada will be rather extraordinary. At Montreal he will meet two brothers, one from Massachusetts and one from New Hampshire. They will proceed from there to St. Ann, where their father, whom they have not seen for forty years, awaits them. They propose to arrive in time to celebrate the birthday of their father, who will have reached the age of 100 years. The old man is said to be in full possession of his faculties and in good general health.

Saturday a party of friends of Lauritz Jensen and C. O. Christianson drove over from their farms near Fisher to spend the evening and following day. A dance was held in the evening at the McClatchie building on Hamilton av, when a most pleasant time was had. Among the guests from Fisher were Christ Anderson and wife, Edward Peterson and wife, Louis Johnson and Christian Peterson. They returned Sunday evening.

It may please the friends of J. C. Heuler to know that he is prospering. At present he is head miller in the Kansas City Mills—an institution that turns out 750 barrels of flour daily. The position of head miller in such an institution is naturally a remunerative one, and Mr. Heuler writes that he enjoys contentment these days.

Today Mr. Peter Emard and Miss Melina Morisette of Emardville were united in marriage by Rev. Fr. Arpin at St. Joseph's church. Mr. Emard has been a resident of this vicinity since boyhood, and has always stood high in the estimation of the people. Miss Morisette is a recent arrival from Canada. The NEWS wishes them every happiness.

The wheat yield bids fair to be enormous this year. The farmers are now awaiting with bated breath the time when the golden sheaves are harvested and beyond the reach of the destructive elements.

In common with thousands of people in the Northwest, we are pleased to be again called upon to note the opening of the Minneapolis Exposition on August 26th, for a month. The Exposition has almost become as much of a necessity to residents of our Northwestern cities and towns as their own business interests. To the farmer's wife and daughters it gives an opportunity of hearing the latest and best music and seeing the finest specimens of the painter's skill at small cost, and of hearing the latest fashions, that being of greater importance to the feminine mind than anything else.

The man who tries to advertise
With printer's ink consistent,
One word must learn, nor from it turn,
And that one word's consistent.

A prominent business man who advertised very little during the late spring season recently gave a large order to The Times to continue during the dull season, "because," as he said, "my experience is that advertising and success in trade are inseparable." He had plenty of trade during the business season; but the time has now come when he must stimulate and create trade, and he turns to the widely read newspaper as the only agency through which it can be done.—Philadelphia Times.

Mr. Laframboise and family and Mr. J. Souvee and family, all of Gentilly, were in town Saturday. They took the train in the evening for Detroit Lake to spend a few days there.

Rev. Rasmus Lavik, pastor of the Lutheran church here, also has charge of a parish at Marion, a station between Fertile and Crookston.

Mrs. Nicholas Majeres has been very ill the past week, but is, we are pleased to state, much improved.

The new sign "H. M. Kaus" above the door of that gentleman's popular general merchandise store, is deserving of mention. It is a grand piece of work, and both Mr. Kaus and Artist Helm may be proud of it.

Miss Katie McNerthney this week completes a term of school at Terrebonne. Miss McNerthney is a practical and conscientious teacher and the Terrebonne school would do well to retain her.

The rain and wind storm lodged some grain. Pierre Bottineau had several acres lodged and also Pierre Emard. It will probably raise again before harvest time.

W. A. Schreiter has just received a shipment of machine oils. Farmers that are in need of oils for machinery will save money if they buy their oils of Schreiter.

Mrs. A. Hennings and Miss Gusta Akerlund drove to Crookston Sunday, Miss Akerlund returning home after a week's visit here. Mrs. Hennings visited till Tuesday at Crookston, when she returned home.

Miss Minnie Zaiser will give her musicale at Fertile next week.

Mr. and Mrs. Otto Kunkle came up from Fertile Tuesday morning to visit a day or two.

The Tindolph block at Thief River Falls, which was built when that town wat first settled, and left unfinished, will now be completed and occupied. The building is an immense structure, three stories high, and has been an eyesore all along. It will soon be the scene of lively business. Thief River Falls is having a steady growth.

Miss Eda Champoux, of Badger Creek visited the city Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Adler spent Tuesday in town.

Mr. Schenecker, agent for the Deering machinery, has opened an office in the Wolf building.

Tuesday afternoon Bessie Hunt celebrated her 9th birthday anniversary by giving a party to her little friends. Though the rain came in torrents now and then and caught all those that ventured out, Bessie's party was still a glowing success, the little people enjoying every minute of that happy afternoon. Mrs. Hunt prepared a tempting repast, which all partook of in juvenile style, guaranteeing the excellence of the refreshments, Bessies little friends all wished her many more such happy anniversaries and the NEWS joins in the hope that Bessies sweet disposition and winning nature may not change as, one after the other, these milestones of life come and go.

Mrs. J. W. Lowe gave a quilting bee Friday evening last at which her lady friends participated. The ladies did some real practical work besides enjoying a delightful afternoon, whice terminated in a tea.

W. A. Ralph and M. Chapin returned from Beltrami county last night.

F. E. Hunt took the train for St. Paul last evening.

Mrs. Lizzie Jerome of West Superior is visiting here.

THE BEECHER STATUE.

A Splendid Memorial of the Great Preacher Just Unveiled.

The statue of Henry Ward Beecher, recently unveiled with elaborate ceremonies, and standing in the little park at Brooklyn city hall, excites the enthusiastic admiration of all who knew the great orator. Mr. John Quincy Adams Ward, the designer, considers this as one of the works which he expects to carry his name and fame to posterity, and the work itself conveys the impression that its construction was a labor of love—the result not only of long familiarity with and artistic study of the subject, but of a loving devotion to the idea as well as the art of reproducing the great man

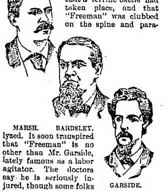
HOW THE STATUE LOOKS.

More Muddled Than Ever.

The tragedy of the Keystone bank crash and the arrest of "Honest John" Bardsley, city treasurer of Philadelphia for embezzlement, etc., was followed appropriately by a bit of sensation. When President Gideon Wells Marsh, of the Keystone, was arrested and "jumped his bail" there was evidence that he had slipped out of the country; but as a reward of $5,000 was offered for him, a host of amateur and regular detectives started up. Among the former was one "Max Freeman," who took a hackman named Tim Hurley as his assistant.

In a few days they reported that they had "treed" Mr. Marsh near Spring Lake, N. J., that a terrific battle had taken place, and that "Freeman" was clubbed on the spine and paralyzed. It soon transpired that "Freeman" is no other than Mr. Garside, lately famous as a labor agitator. The doctors say he is seriously injured, though some folks are mean enough to insinuate that he isn't very badly hurt and that he never got sight of Marsh.



MARSH. BARDSLEY. GARSIDE.

Ex-Treasurer Bardsley has made a very minute "confession," and from that and his accounts it appears that he owes the city $191,061.63 and the state $1,002,760.64; that of this $925,000 went into the Keystone bank as nominal deposits, and for the rest he has available bonds, stocks and notes. "Speculation" is the convenient word to explain the loss. Mr. Bardsley insists that with all his private property and all that can be recovered city and state will lose little or nothing, and therefore asks to be let off easy. He admits his guilt in loaning public funds to private parties, and is a "really affecting example of penitence."

New York's Oldest Portrait Painter.

Daniel Huntington, the portrait painter of New York, still practices his art in a leisurely way. He recently retired from the presidency of the National Academy of Design, an office which he had held continuously for thirty years. During his long career he has probably painted more portraits of prominent men than any other American artist. His work has always enjoyed great popularity and is even now as pleasing to many people as the newer style of portraiture introduced by the younger men who have brought from France, Italy and Spain different ideas of art with which they hope to found in America a better school than the old. Mr. Huntington is seventy-five years of age, but is still vigorous and could get, if he would accept them, more commissions than he is willing to undertake.

The Chicago University.

An appropriate site has been secured for the Chicago university, which was generously endowed by John D. Rockefeller, the philanthropical millionaire, and the erection of new buildings will be proceeded with at once. The plans provide for a divinity school dormitory, for the building of which Mr. Rockefeller donated $100,000; a university dormitory to cost $100,000, and a recitation hall to cost $150,000. Martin A. Ryerson contributed $25,000 toward buying the land for the university, which, it is believed, will have the finest grounds in the country.

The "bean-shooter" is doomed on Long Island. The Kings County Grand Jury says it must go. This will make the small boy's heart wilt. He will have to knock out people's eyes hereafter with brickbats.

Among Queen Victoria's treasures is a unique gown presented to her by ex-Empress Eugenie. It is made entirely of spiders' webs and was probably intended to symbolize the fact that there are no flies on her majesty when it comes to a question of accepting a rare gift.

The 1-year-old child of the Grand Duke Paul of Russia has just had sixty-four pairs of shoes made for his wear. The old adage "uneasy is the head that wears a crown may apparently be extended to cover the other extremities.

The Princeton student who lost his life while trying to save three servant girls from drowning is given special praise because the saved were domestics. It is fair to presume that he would almost as soon have lost his life in trying to rescue three society belles, or even a trio of princesses.

As an indication of the esteem in which American machinery is held in our sister republics, a recent consular report states that nearly two hundred and fifty American built locomotives have been shipped to Brazil in the last ten years. At this rate it will not be long before the English locomotive will have to go.

Undying fame awaits a Frankfort woman who has originated a novel and unique though painful method of committing sucide. She went into a zoological garden there and fed herself to the bears. The system has obvious advantages, but unlike others it affords pleasure to at least a few—viz. the bears.

Another streak of railway accidents seems to have stricken the country. If the laws regarding these fatal casualties were enforced upon the derelict employes of the roads in this country with the assiduity practiced in Russia or China the chances are that the annual succession of horrors would cease or at least be diminished.

Not only did Mlle Marie Bashkirtseff keep a journal from the tender age of five, talk several languages, play upon a number of musical instruments, read no end of books and paint pictures, but she also wrote letters to every one she knew and took copies of everyone of them, in her own handwriting, and now they are published. A very remarkable girl was Mlle, Marie.

James Campbell of Philadelphia, who was a member of President Pierce's official family, is the oldest cabinet officer in the country. Although close to the more than patriarchal age of four-score years, he may be seen on the streets almost daily exhibiting the elastic step that befits a semi-centenarian. His interest in public affairs is unabated.

A Michigan man was shot, beaten, and nearly tarred and feathered and hanged because he refused to relinquish the maid of his choice. Courting is pretty rough in the Wolverine state, but if the unhappy victim lives and marries the girl he may even come to worse straits of unhappiness and regret that his jealous rivals hadn't finished him e'er Hymen's noose replaced the one they had prepared for him.

Washington for its size, is a small place. Its street lamps are not lighted on nights when the almanac says the moon should shine, and as, even in Washington, the weather bureau isn't on speaking terms with the almanac, the results of this custom are bad, especially for the stranger. Then, again, there are few shoeblacks; the hotels do not all have them, and the streets are not furnished with many of them. Even the clubs get along without them. It seems logical to suppose that everyone blackens his own shoes.

Meissonier's successor in the Presidency of the National Society of French Artists is Puvis de Chovannes, who is the antithesis of his predecessor intellectually and physically. Intellectually, he is an idealist and a poet; personally a man of tall figure and snow-white hair; a thorough gentleman, elegant and fastidious. He has none of Meissonier's arbitrary ways and lacks in particular his consuming hatred of Americans. De Chovannes is a great painter of frescoes, and recently he has been constantly employed decorating the walls of public buildings in Paris and in the provinces of France. He is a man well advanced in years.

It is thought that arrangements may be made by which the firm will be enabled to continue in business.

LOVE'S RUGGED PATH.

Mary's Lover Imprisoned in the Coal Cellar.

The late Dr. Wightman, sitting up later than usual one night, sunk in the profundities of a great idea, imagined he heard a sound in the kitchen inconsistent with the quietude and security of a manse; so, taking his candle, he proceeded to investigate the cause. His foot being heard in the passage, the housemaid began with earnestness to damp the fire, as if preparing for bed.

"Ye're late up to-night, Mary."

"I'm just rakin' the fire, sir, and gaun to bed."

"That's right, Mary, I like timeous hours."

On his way back to the study he passed the coal cellar, and, turning the key, he took it with him. Next morning at an early hour there was a rap at his bedroom door and a request for the key to light the fire.

Half an hour later there was another knock, and a similar request in order to prepare breakfast.

"I don't want breakfast so soon, Mary; go back to your bed."

Another half hour and another knock, with an entreaty for the key as it was washing day. This was enough. He arose and handed out the key, saying:—

"Go and let the man out."

Mary's sweetheart had, as the doctor shrewdly suspected, been imprisoned in the coal cellar, where, Pyramis and Thisbe like, they had breathed their love to each other through the key-hole.

When Playing Cards Were First Used.

The French are believed to be the first people in Europe to use playing cards, and, as first made, cards were supposed to represent the different classes of persons in the kingdom. The heats were the "choir-men," or ecclesiastics, and early cards of this suit have a cope which, in form, somewhat resembles a heart. The figure by us called a spade was originally a pike head, and typified the nobility and soldiery; the artisans were represented by a stone tile, now known as diamond, while the formers were symbolized by the trefoil or clover leaf, by us called a club. The four kings were originglly David, Alexander, Cæsar and Charlemagne, representing the four great monarches, while the queens were Argine, Esther, Judith, and Pallas, typical of birth, piety, fortitude and wisdom, Argine being an anagram of Regina. The knaves were either knights or servants to knights, but which is uncertain, though the former conjecture is the more probable, from the fact that on cards of an early date appear the names of famous knights. The French cards of the present day retain the names already mentioned of the kings and queens.—Globe-Democrat.

A Bull-Fight With Fun In It.

In ordinary accounts of bull-fights you hear of the sickening sight of disemboweled horses, and bleeding men, and butchered bulls. This went on with ever-changing fun, shouts, and laughter, but no one was either hurt or got the cocardes. Whoever thinks it is merely a joke to go down into one of these enormous arenas and snatch the tiny rosette from between the horns of a beast who has been trained all his life to keep him from getting it, will find that he has a large piece of work cut out for him. For fun a Provencal bull-fight beats a pantomime. For danger and expertness it is far ahead of anything I ever saw. As it goes on every Sunday in the summer time all over Provence, Frenchmen regard it as too common an affair to be worth description. Foreigners never going there at the proper season,—the summer and autumn,—never or scarcely ever see it. And even down in La Camargue, on the banks of the Rhone, in little towns, all of which save Aigues-Mortes are unknown, the courses, like base-ball matches, are held every fete-day. They are the sport of the people, and have much more character in the small towns.—Century.

DEEP IN THE MIRE.

Startling Disclosures Made Before Various Committees of Inquiry in the Canadian Parliament.

Many High Officials in Public Departments Susceptible to the Wily Boodlers.

OTTAWA, Ont., July 14.—There is great excitement in political circles over the startling disclosures made before various parliamentary committees of inquiry during the past few weeks.

The evidence adduced thus far goes to show that the public officials are corrupt, and that an utter state of demoralization prevails in all public departments.

The opposition feel very jubilant over the progress made from day to day in unearthing fresh scandals. It is confidently predicted that before the session closes the government, already reduced to a majority of twenty, will find itself sitting on the opposition benches. The various charges have aroused the entire country, and the independent newspapers do not hesitate to declare that the administration is drifting into a state of chaos.

It remains to be seen what defense Premier Abbott and his associates will make at the proper juncture. They discussed the situation at an all-day sitting of the cabinet Saturday.

The decision was reached that prompt measures will be adopted in purging the various departments. Wholesale dismissals will follow in a few days. The government is all the more embarrassed owing to the approach of the bye elections. These constitute at least fifty in number, and will be held within six months or probably at an earlier date.

Public opinion is setting in favor of the Liberals, who also propose to make as much capital as possible with the farming element out of the hopelessness of looking to Washington so long as the present administration remains in office. Sir Richard Cartright and the Hon. Mr. Laurier, the Liberal leaders, have already laid out a vigorous plan of campaign. They propose to stump the country at the earliest opportunity, and will call into the service all their powerful speakers. Indications point to a clean sweep for the Liberals in Quebec. The Hon. Mr. Mercer, the Liberal premier, has promised to co-operate with all his forces at his command. Tory corruption and misrule will be the watchword in Ontario, where the wholesale extravagance of the government is seen in its worst forms. Meanwhile the opposition continue to weave the fatal web, which promises to drive from public life Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Adolphe Caron.

At the parliamentary committee various witnesses have given damaging evidence against the defence. Witness Owen E. Murphy, a contractor, who by the way is the fugitive ex-treasurer of the New York school board, swore that he personally paid Sir Hector Langevin the sum of $15,000 for awarding Murphy's firm a $1,000,000 contract. The witness, although told a straight story, which seems to be well supported by other circumstantial evidence. Nicholas K. Connelly, an Irish-American, who had an interest in the boodling contracting firm, denies the correctness of Murphy's allegation to Henry, one of the counsel of the public works department. Witness said there was no truth in the statement made by Murphy in his evidence here, that witness had reported a payment of $10,000 to Sir Hector Langevin and his son La Force. He had never made any such payment and never said he did. He also contradicted all the statements made by Murphy with respect to payments by or on behalf of the firm to Sir Hector Langevin or his son or son-in-law.

Mr. Tarte, M. P., a former government supporter, who is now conducting the prosecution, says that more damaging revelations are yet to come. Both Sir Hector and Sir Adolphe Caron, the minister of militia, he says, will be glad to seek retirement within a few days. The scapegoat thus far is H. F. Perley, chief engineer of the public works department. Witness Murphy testified that he gave Perley jewelry and diamonds valued at $1,885. Mr. Perley, who hitherto has enjoyed an unblemished reputation, gave evidence the following day to the alarm and consternation of the government. He CONFESSED THE WHOLE TRANSACTION.

He is now under suspension, and his resignation will be accepted as soon as the inquiry concludes. Although the government has a majority in the committee the evidence is so damaging that a report favorable to the prosecution is likely to be submitted to the house. There is no other alternative.

The scandal in the interior department is no less serious. The evidence adduced upon oath goes to show that many clerks signed checks under assumed names and drew pay for extra work. This is a direct violation of the civil service act. Mr. A. M. Burgess, deputy minister of the department, is also involved. It was proven that he drew a balance due his father-in-law by doubling a check payable to another clerk. He has already tendered his resignation. Several other public departments will be overhauled next.

The Liberals propose to arraign Postmaster General Haggert, who is a member of the administration. They say they can prove that a lady employed in the department went to Europe and drew her salary during her absence. Mr. Haggert says the story is untrue and that he can offer a full explanation. All in all the situation for the government is a serious one, and stirring events may be expected shortly. I the cabinet holds together long enough a reconstruction will take place after the session.

Poisonous Dried Beef.

HURON, S. D., Special Telegram, July 14.—Fred Liepold is the only one now sick of the nine persons poisoned here Saturday evening from eating dried beef containing some poison matter. Physicians to-night say he is out of danger and will be all right in a few days. It is thought the meat was diseased before being dried. It was purchased from a local dealer, who bought it in Chicago. Only those who partook of this particular piece were made sick.

Driven to Her Death.

YANKTON, S. D., Special Telegram, July 14.—Katie Kratz, a girl recently employed at the Merchants hotel, committed suicide to-day by jumping into the Missouri river. The cause is said to have been the persecution of the girl by her parents on account of certain rumors involving her chastity. The body cannot be found.

A Sunday Stabbing Affray.

ALGONA, Iowa, Special Telegram, July 14.—Herman Rantzow, Mike Hubbard and Seymour Allen indulged in too much booze yesterday. As the result of it they got into a fight. The two first named attacked Allen with knives, seriously wounding him. They are under arrest.

CAMPAELL OR KLINE.

Anti-Campbell Men Combine Under the Cry of "Anything to Beat Campbell."

CLEVELAND, Ohio, July 14.—The delegates to the Ohio Democratic convention are rapidly congregating from all sections of the state, and as the decisive day draws nearer interest in the event deepens with every passing hour.

It is now conceded by all the neutral and unprejudiced that Gov. James E. Campbell will be renominated for governor on the first ballot. His opponents are Lawrence T. Neal of Chillicothe and Virgil P. Kline of Cleveland.

Up to this time Neal has been his principal competitor, the only apparent following of Kline being the Cuayhoga county delegation, which was instructed for the Cleveland lawyer largely as a matter of city and county pride. But the leaven of politics works queer results, and the boom in a few brief hours has assumed a proportion which makes that gentleman apparently the only formidable opponent of Gov. Campbell.

The logic of the situation has caused all anti-Campbell men to combine under the battle cry of "anything to beat Campbell," and the question with them is no longer which of the governor's competitors has the most votes, but which is the most available candidate and the most likely to succeed as a dark horse? To this query there is little division of sentiment. Kline is absent on his way to Europe, too far away to give pledges and promises, and his pronounced low tariff convictions and eminent campaigning qualities mark him as the most available candidate of the opposition, since the feud engendered between the Neal and Campbell factions gives the former little hope of increasing his strength in the convention. Mr. Kline has managed his campaign

WITH CONSUMMATE DIPLOMACY.

When his home county instructed for him he received the news jocularly and gave no evidence of being an earnest aspirant for gubernatorial honors. On the contrary, he was on terms of warmest friendship with both Campbell and Neal, the leading competitors, and one of the most serious charges which the absence of the Cuyhoga county candidate makes it impossible for him to answer is that he recently on separate occasions pledged his support to both Campbell and Neal. He has left a letter, however, with Maj. W. W. Armstrong of Cleveland, which will be read in the convention on Wednesday, declaring his willingness to serve his party if selected by the convention as the candidate for governor.

It now looks as though the anti-Campbell delegates, when nominations are declared in order on Wednesday, will ask for an informal ballot, but that the governor's friends will oppose this and demand business and a formal ballot. In this event Campbell will be found be ore the roll is called to have three-fifths of the votes of the convention.

A MURDER IN THE WOODS.

Pat Ryan Killed and Mutilated North of Brainerd.

BRAINERD, Minn., Special Telegram, July 14.—News has been received here of a cold-blooded murder which was committed at George Barclay's lumber ranch, thirty-five miles up the river from this place. The details are very meager as yet. Phillip Provost, the courier who brought the news, stayed only long enough to notify the coroner, and Sheriff Spalding has gone to the scene of the bloody tragedy.

The murdered man's name was Pat Ryan, well known in Brainerd and along the river, where he has worked for some years. His body was found behind Barclay's barn cut almost beyond recognition.

Several stories are afloat as to who committed the deed, one being that a man named Ellis and Ryan were on a drunk; that in a fight Ellis murdered him, to substantiate which it is said that Ellis' knife was found sticking in his body. Another story is that Bunga Buck, a notorious Indian in these parts, enticed Ryan into the woods behind the barn and stabbed him to death. The sheriff will return to-morrow, at which time the mystery will probably be cleared up. The body of Ryan arrived from Barclay's, and was buried to-night on account of decomposition, having laid since Friday night. An inquest has been held, but no news of the decision.

Fred Ellis and his squaw wife are under arrest; also three Indians. The party will arrive in Brainerd by daylight to-morrow.

BOTH WRONG.

Washington's Governor Talks About the Nicolay-McClure Controversy.

OLYMPIA, Wash., Special Telegram, July 14.—Gov. Ferry, who sat in the first Republican convention in Illinois and was an intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln, has been interviewed relative to the controversy between John G. Nicolay and Editor McClure. Gov. Ferry says both Nicolay and McClure are wrong in some points.

"I was a delegate myself to the convention of 1864," he said, "and on my way from Illinois to the Monument City I called on Lincoln in Washington. One of the primary motives was to obtain from Lincoln an expression regarding his choice for vice president. I brought it up during my call upon the president but he gave an evasive answer. Later on I again expressed the desire to know whom he desired to see nominated, and again he answered evasively. Just before leaving the White House I again brought the question to his attention. This time he said, 'It is sometimes advisable to leave things as they are.'"

HURT IN A RUNAWAY.

Six Persons Severely Injured, Two Probably Fatally.

ASPEN, Colo., July 14.—Frank Ellis, the eighth victim of the Midland disaster at Aspen Junction, died early this morning. Leonard and wife cannot live, and Thomas O'Donnell's principal injuries are from inhaling the scalding steam, he not being so badly burned about the face as the others. It is also now reported that none of the injured can survive, the loss of cuticle and the shock to their nervous systems being too great.

Miss Mary O'Donnell, the ninth victim of the accident, died this evening. Her brother, Thomas O'Donnell, is alive, but may die at any moment. The rest of the injured are in a fair way to recovery. The coroner began the inquest over the dead this afternoon. Conductor Miller, of the excursion train, was the only witness called. He said he did not know how the accident occurred, as his train was backing down very slowly and all precautions had been taken.

The Truth Will Be Known.

NEW YORK, July 14.—The body of Harris Smiler, one of the four murderers who were executed at Sing Sing last Tuesday, will be exhumed to-morrow at Woodlawn cemetery by Coroner Levy and an autopsy made by Dr. William T. Jenkins, the coroner's physician. The inquest will be held next Monday. The coroner says he will have a jury composed of intelligent medical men and electrical experts to sit at the inquest. Subpœnas will be served on the witnesses who were present at the execution at Sing Sing and Warden Brown will be summoned during the week.

FOR OUR YOUNG PEOPLE.

INFORMATION AND AMUSEMENT FOR THE YOUNG.

The Burton Boys' Cannon--Rose-Leaf Butterflies--A Good Word for the College Boys--Jack and the Circus.

The Burton Boys' Cannon.

"Lucky stars! What a find!" cried Edwin.

"I declare! It's a rifle-barrel," said John.

And Willie and Lucius forgot their search for Indian arrow-heads, which they sometimes found on this worn old gravely roadside, and hurried to have a look at the treasure.

"Just see the rust!" said John. "It may have laid there fifty years."

"I s'pose this was all thick woods then," said Edwin.

"And likely some man had this to fight the Injuns," said Lucius.

"Or bears," said Willie. "More likely bears."

"Look how the barrel's bent and twisted," said John.

"That's where he clubbed his rifle and whacked the old Injun over the head," said Lucius.

"That's where the bear grabbed it away from him," said Willie. "And I do believe there's the mark of his teeth right there near the muzzle!"

At this the older brother hooted and laughed, and said that the bear must have had his teeth sharpened, and they gussed he ate up the rest of the gun, and that was why nothing could be found but the barrel.

Willie did not like any too well to be laughed at, but he kept his temper, and as soon as he could make himself heard, he cried, "O boys, I've got the greatest idea! Let's make a cannon out of this for the Fourth!"

"Now, Willie, you've struck it," said John.

"That's so," said Lucius, "but how'll we fix the thing?"

"I'll tell you," said Edwin. Just come along to Fet Wheaton's blacksmith shop, and he'll do it up for us in grand shape."

"Father won't mind, will he?" asked Willie.

"Course not, if we pay out of our own Fourth of July money" said John.

"It'll be ten times better than crackers," said Edwin. "Come on, boys."

So away they rushed to the good-natured, curly-headed blacksmith, who sawed off the straight part of the barrel, fitted a new breech-pin, bored a touchhole, and wouldn't take a cent.

On the evening of July third the boys had quite an exciting time mounting and loading their cannon. Father Burton had not a word to say against the fun.

He dealt out the powder and watched the whole process; and when he saw the amount of brick they rammed in to help make a noise, he remarked that he guessed they were "loading for b'ar, sure enough!"

Mother looked rather anxious, but after all she was sure father would see that 'twas safe. And so he did—after his own fashion.

When all was ready there was quite a discussion as to who should touch it off next morning.

John thought he ought to, because he was oldest. Willie claimed the right, because he thought of the plan. Edwin was equally firm, because he found the rifle-barrel. And Lucius thought they had better trust him, because his legs were longest and he could get out of the way quick if it didn't work right.

Finally it was agreed that it should be whoever was on the ground first in the morning.

And Willie resolved at once not to sleep a wink all night. John made up his mind that he could rouse when old Cock-a-doodle first crowed. Edwin thought he could be sure to hear the clock strike three. While Lucius knew he should waken if either of the others stirred, and relied on his long legs to take him out ahead.

But how boys do sleep! Not one of them heard a sound after the clock struck nine until—Boom! CRASH! All their wonderful dreams were scattered into broad daylight, and they jerked their clothes on and gathered in the back yard almost before the smoke cleared away.

Mother was laughing to herself in bed. Father was laughing and shouting from the kitchen window. But where was the cannon?

"Just blown to nowhere!" said John.

"Lucky stars!" cried Edwin; "but it's a good thing we boys weren't hanging around when it went!"—Youth's Companion.

Rose-Leaf Butterflies.

"We want to be butterflies, cried the rose leaves. "We are tired of staying on our stems. We want to fly round and see what is going on."

"My dear children," said the mother rose-bush, "if God had wanted you to be butterflies, he would not have made you rose leaves so be contented."

But they were not contented to be beautiful pink rose leaves. One day they begged the wind to unloose them so they could fly away. The wind blew and blew, very soon the rose leaves unloosed from their mother bush. They flew down the road, and for a short time really felt as if they were butterflies. They saw many things they had never seen before.

Pretty soon some children came running down the road, their hats in their hands.

The rose levaes did not know enough to fly away from the children, as real butterflies would have done, so the poor things were caught in the straw sun-hats.

"Oh, we have been fooled! These are nothing but horrid rose leaves," cried the children, as they crushed the beautiful leaves in their chubby brown hands.

Then they ran to the bush, and found a few good roses. "Oh, you beauties!" cried the children. "We'll carry some of you to our sick mamma."

"Dear me!" sighed the runaway rose leaves, as they lay bruised and dying in the hot road. 'Oh, if we only had minded mother, and been contented!'—Harper's Young people.

The Gunsmith and Laborer.

A certain Cranky, Disgruntled Old Gunsmith was found smiling one day in his workshop. When asked by a laborer the cause of his uncommon Cheerfulness, he said that "there was rumors of war in Europe."

"What seems to be the Trouble?" asked the Laborer.

"Russia is going to help France to Whallop Germany or else to get France into a Whalloping. I don't care which. It's War and that's what I want. Then Italy is a ripping and a tearing about the Dagoes that were removed in New Orleans. That is another war on hand."

"I'm Sorry," sighed the Laborer; "it'll be hard on the poor."

"I'm glad," replied the Gunsmith; "it will help my trade, and how will it harm you? You will get bigger pay, 'cause men will be scarce and they can't make you fight 'cause you are too old."

"Well, it is this Way," answered the Laborer: "in case of War Some One has got to get Licked. France will either be a Part of the German Empire or else Germany will belong to France. Then if Italy goes to war with Us, it will make Italy One of the Southern States. No matter which Way it Goes, it'll make a Change in the Geography of the World."

"Suppose it does?" cried the Gunsmith with some wrath. "What harm will it Do You?"

"Quite a good Deal of Harm," answered the Laborer with a tired look. "I have six Kids agoing to School and in case of War every blessed One of them will have to Get a New Geography and it will cost me four or five Dollars. Oh, I see how it is. Some Book Agent has Started the Row and We will have to Stand it."

MORAL—It is a Queer Calamity that don't please Some One. The Gun Maker is pleased with War and the Undertaker is Tickled over a Funeral. But the Book Agent is with Us always, and if he can't make trade Go one way he will Try another.

Jack and the Circus.

Little Jack Johnson went to the big circus when it came to the city nearest his town, and like all little boys, enjoyed it very much.

When Jack got back to his farm he wished very much indeed that he could ride on a horse while standing up. The more he thought of it the more anxious he became to try it on old white Kitty, his father's horse.

One afternoon while his father was away, Jack took old Kate out of the barn, climbed from a fence to her back and stood there looking like a circus rider, as he thought.

Old Katy was more used to drawing a farm wagon then she was at playing circus, so when she felt Jack's shoes on her back she felt a little uneasy, and away she trotted with the young circus man holding on for dear life.

Jack was very much frightened, so was Katy, and so was every one else who saw them. Away went the old horse down the street, the dust flying in a cloud behind her. Jack held the reins and kept very cool indeed, and finally drove Katy around the square and into her own stable again.

Jack did not fall off during his first ride, but he told his father that night that he thought it wasn't so very much fun to ride horses like the circus man after all.

All he said was, that if Jack tried to ride a horse like that again, there would be a real circus when he caught him.

A Good Word for the College Boys.

An American college contains from 500 to 1,500 boys, rich, poor, ambitious, or thoughtless, as the case may be. Among them there are sure to be a mischief-making element. The escapades of these are telegraphed over the country and commented on by a sternly-indignant press. Had the indiscretions been committed by boys out of college they would never have attracted passing attention. From these widely circulated stories, always exaggerated and affecting at most but a handful of students, the idea has sprung that to send a boy to college is to cast him into a moral fiery furnace where he will be assailed by every form of temptation. This is as far from the truth as it can well be. There are few temptations in college life which are not encountered in the every-day world; on the other hand there is a standard of college morals which must be lived up to by any student who cares to preserve his social standing among his fellows. This is not in some ways a high standard, but it is higher than any to be found in common use outside college walls. To live by it is to acquire the habit of thought and the manners of a gentleman. The only wonder is that college disturbances are so rare.—Albany Journal.

THE population of Iceland at present is something over 72,000, and a scheme is on foot to remove the entire population to Alaska. This is a good idea. All the honest people being thus removed, Iceland might be utilized as a Botany Bay for dishonest politicians and such defeated canidates as are now sent up "Salt River."

A BURGLAR'S STORY.

My profession isn't a very popular one; there is considerable prejudice against it, I don't myself think it's much worse than a good many others. However, that's nothing to do with my story.

Some years ago me and the gentleman who was at that time connected with me in business—he's met with reverses since then and at present isn't able to go out—was looking around for a job, being at that time rather hard up, as you might say. We struck a small country town. I ain't a-goin' to give it away by telling where it was or what the name of it was.

There was one bank there; the manager was a rich old duffer—owned the mills, owned the bank, owned most of the town. There wasn't no other officer but the cashier, and they had a boy who used to sweep out and run errands. The bank was in the main street, pretty well up one end of it—a nice, snug place, at the corner of a cross street, with nothing very near it.

We took our observations, and found there wasn't no trouble at all about it. There was an old watchman that walked up and down the street at night, when he didn't fall asleep and forget it.

The vault had two doors. The outside one was chilled iron, and had a three-wheel combination lock. The inner door wasn't no door at all. You could kick it open. It didn't pretend to be anything but fire-proof and wasn't even that.

The first thing we done, of course was to fit a key to the outside door. As the lock on the outside door was an old-fashioned Bacon lock, any gentleman in my profession who chances to read this article will know just how easy that job was and how we done it.

I may say here that the gentlemen in my line of business, having at times a good deal of leisure on their hands, do considerable reading, and are particularly fond of a neat bit of writing; in fact in the way of literature, I have found among 'em—however, this being digression, I drop it, and go on with the main job again.

This was our plan: After the key was fitted I was to go into the bank, and Jim—that wasn't his name, of course, but let it pass—was to keep watch on the outside. When anyone passed he was to tip me a whistle, and then I doused the glim and lay low; after they got by I goes on again, Simple and easy, you see. Well, the night as we selected, the President happened to be out of town; gone down to the city, as he often did. I got inside all right, with a slide lantern, a breast drill, a small steel jimmy, a bunch of skeleton keys and a green-baize bag to stow the swag, I fixed my light and rigged my breast-drill, and got to work on the door right over the lock.

Probably a great many of your readers are not so well posted as me about bank locks, and I may say for them that a three-wheeled combination lock has three wheels in it, and a slot in each wheel. In order to unlock the door you have to get the three slots opposite to each other at the top of the lock. Of course, if you know the number the lock is set on you can do this; but if you don't you have to depend on your ingenuity. There is in each of these wheels a small hole, through which you put a wire through the back of the lock when you change the combination. Now, if you can bore a hole through the door and pick up these wheels by running a wire through these holes, why, you can open the door. I hope I make myself clear. I was boring that hole. The door was chilled iron, about the neatest stuff I ever worked on:

I went on steady enough; only stopped when Jim—which, as I said before, wasn't his real name—whistled outside, and the watchman toddled by. I heard Jim—so to speak—whistle again. I stopped, and I'm blowed if they didn't come right up the bank steps, and I heard a key in the lock. I was so dumbfounded when I heard that that you could have slipped the bracelets right on me. I picked up my lantern, and I'll be hanged if I didn't let the slide slip down and throw the light right on the door, and there was the manager. Instead of calling for help, as I supposed he would, he took a step inside the door and shaded his eyes with his hand and looked at me. I knowed I ought to knock him down and cut, but I'm blest if I could, I was so surprised.

"Who are you?" says he.

"Who are you?" says I, thinking that was an innocent remark, as he commenced it, and a-trying all the time to collect myself.

"I'm the President of the bank," says he, kinder short; "something the matter with the lock?"

By George! the idea came to me then.

"Yes, sir," says I, touching my cap; "Mr. Jennings, he telegraphed this morning as the lock was out of order and he couldn't get in, and I'm come on to open it for him.

"I told Jennings a week ago," says he, that he ought to get that lock fixed. Where is he?"

"He's been a-writing letters, and he's gone up to his house to get another letter he wanted for to answer."

"Well, why don't you go on?" says he.

"I've got almost through," says I; "and I didn't want to finish up and open the vault till there was somebody here."

"That's very creditable of you," says he; "a very proper sentiment, my man. You can't," he goes on, coming round by the door, "be too particular about avoiding the very suspicion of evil."

"No, sir," says I, kinder modest-like.

"What do you suppose is the matter with the lock?" says he.

"I don't rightly know yet," says I; but I rather think it's a little wore, on account of not being oiled enough. These 'ere locks ought to be oiled about once a year."

"Well," he says, "you might as well go on now, I'm here; I will stay till Jennings comes. Can't I help you—hold your lantern, or something of that sort?"

The thought came to me like a flash, and I turned round and says:

"How do I know you're the President? I ain't ever seen you afore, and you may be a-tryin' to crack this bank for all I know."

"That's a very proper inquiry, my man," says he, "and shows a most remarkable degree of discretion. I confess than I should not have thought of the position in which I was placing you. However, I can easily convince you that it's all right. Do you know what the President's name is?"

"No, I don't," says I, sorter surley.

"Well, you'll find it on the bill," says he, taking a bill out of his pocket; "and you see the name on these letters," and he took some letters from his coat.

I suppose I ought to have gone right on then, but I was beginning to feel interested in making him prove who he was, and so I says:

"You might have got them letters to put up a job on me."

"You're a very honest man," says he—"one among a thousand. Don't think I am at all offended at your persistence. No, my good fellow, I like it—I like it!" and he laid his hand on my shoulder. "Now, here," says he, taking a bundle out of his pocket, "is a package of £2000 in bonds. A burglar wouldn't be apt to carry those about with him, would he? I bought them in the city yesterday and stopped here to-night on my way home to place them in the vault, and I may add that your simple and manly honesty has so touched me that I would willingly leave them in your hands for safe-keeping. You needn't blush at my praise."

I suppose I did turn sorter red when I see them bonds.

"Are you satisfied now?" says he.

I told him I was, and so I picked up my drill again and gave him the lantern to hold so that I could see the door. I heard Jim, as I call him, outside once or twice, and I like to have burst out laughing thinking how he must be wondering what was going on inside. I worked away and kept explaining to him what I was trying to do. He was very much interested in mechanics, he said, and he knowed as I was up in my business by the way I went to work. He asked me about what wages I got, and how I liked my business, and said he took quite a fancy to me. I turned around once in a while and looked at him a settin' up there as solemn as a biled owl, with my dark lantern in his blessed hand, blamed if I didn't think I should have to holler right out.

I got through the lock pretty soon, and put in my wire and opened it. Then he took hold of the door and opened the vault.

"I'll dut my bonds in," says he, "and go home. You can lock up and wait till Mr. Jennings comes. I don't suppose you will try to fix the lock to-night?"

I told him I shouldn't do anything more with it now, as we could get in before morning.

"Well, I'll bid you good night, my man," says he, as I swung the door to again.

Just then I heard Jim, by name, whistle, and I guessed the watchman was a-coming up the street.

"Ah," says I, "you might speak to the watchman, if you see him, and tell him to keep an extra lookout to-night."

"I will," says he, and we both went to the front door.

"There comes the watchman up the street." "Watchman, this man has been fixing the bank lock, and I want you to keep a sharp lookout to night. He will stay here until Mr. Jennings comes."

"Good night, again," says he, and we shook hands, and he went up the street.

I saw Jim, so called in the shadow on the other side of the street, as I stood on the step with the watchman.

"Well," says I to the watchman, "I'll go and pick up my tools and get ready to go."

I went back into the bank, and it didn't take long to throw the door open and stuff them bonds into the bag. There were some boxes lying around, and a safe I should rather have liked to have tackled; but it seemed like tempting Providence after the luck we'd had. I looked at my watch and see it was just a quarter past 12. I tucked my tools in the bag on the top of the bonds and walked out in front of the door. The watchman was on the steps.

"I don't believe I'll wait for Mr. Jennings," says I. "I suppose it will be all right if I give you his key?"

"That's all right." says the watchman.

"I wouldn't go away very far from the bank," says I.

"No, I won't," says he. "I'll stay about here all night."

"Good night," says I, and I shook hands with him, and me and Jim—which wasn't his right name, you understand took the 12:30 express, and the best part of that job was we never heard anything about it.

It never got into the papers.—New York Dispatch.

Representative Limberchin—"Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill because I consider it an unwise measure and a piece of buncombe. I condemn it, both as a piece of buncombe and as an unwise measure; and, believing it to be not only an unwise measure, but a piece of buncombe as well, I feel myself called upon, Mr, Speaker, to record my vote against this measure on the sole ground that it is an unwise measure and a piece of buncombe, it being my unalterable conviction that neither a piece of buncombe nor an unwise measure should be crystalized into a law."

And yet people wonder that the legislative session is so long.—Boston Transcript.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

A New Church Edifice.

The erection of a new church edifice in a community is always hailed with delight and is considered a benefit to a town. The Presbyterians of this place, though commendably active and energetic, have heretofore felt unequal to the task of erecting an edifice, and have been content to hold services here and there. The conclusion has been reached, however, to erect a building, and work has already commenced. The site—Kretzschmar avenue, between 5th and 6th st, is a pleasant one, and will be largely enhanced in beauty by the improvements soon to be made on it

The Ladies' Ball.

To use the old time-worn expression "It was a grand success" would almost be doing this novel event an injustice, and yet those words express the truth. It was one of those occasions that are likely, in time to come, to stand out in bold relief, enshrined in bright letters on memory scroll. The first impression upon reaching Opera Hall, where the dance was held, was derived from the decorations. The young ladies on the committee on decorations had succeeded admirably, and no part of the large hall was without its share of the rich foliage that sparkled in the light. About seventy people attended the dance. The grand march, led by Mr. and Mrs. John A. Duffy, was participated in by all those who danced. From this time till refreshments were served, and from then till two, the guests were given every opportunity to enjoy the dance. The refreshments were cake and lemonade, and no allusion is necessary to this important part of every enjoyable event, further than that the guests announced it superb. The music was furnished by the Dargan orchestra, and a vote of thanks from all in attendance would not be amiss. The affair was a full dress occasion, and some of the toilletes worn by the fair entertainers deserve yet defy description. The young ladies having the matter in charge were one and all and altogether, such a conglomeration of youthful beauty and dainty, dazzling, indescribable, intoxicating loveliness that any attempt at description on the part of the writer would evince supreme conceit. Every detail of the ball was managed by them, as follows:

Committee on Decoration.
- Rosa Zeh.
- Mary Brady.
- Musetta Fletcher.
- Mattie Gervais.

Committee on Reception.
- Lizzie Boyle.
- Rebecca Brunelle.
- Elodia Bray.
- Maria Ralph.

Committee on Refreshments.
- Tillie Kaufer.
- Mollie Duffy.

NOTES.

The regrets sent were few.

The evening was delightfully cool—almost frosty, in fact.

Mrs. Hunt's chocolate cake carried off the honors, as usual.

The couple that attended "on their own hook" seemed to enjoy every phase of the dance—especially the supper.

The grand march was one of the finest features of the ball. The floor manager carried it out until the performers evinced fatigue.

That bore, "The Virginia Reel," and its companion piece, "The Cicilian Circle," were omitted, to the everlasting gratitude of everybody.

The profusion of flowers worn was remarkable. Mrs. J. E. Stiles and Mrs. Jas. Meehan Jr. wore water lilies that evoked much admiration.

There were a few out of town guests in attendance. Among them were: Mrs. J. F. Krost, of Hammond, Ind., Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Stiles, of Pembina, Dak., Miss Rubertus, of Washington, D. C., Miss Lowe and Mr. Marcil of Crookston.

Happy Hooslers.

Wm. Timmons, Postmaster of Idaville. Ind., writes: "Electric Bitters has done more for me than all other medicines combined, for that bad feeling arises from Kidney and Liver trouble." John Leslie, farmer and stockman, of the same place says: "Find Electric bitters to be the best Kidney and Live medicine, made me feel like a new man." J. W. Gardner, hardware merchant, same town, says: Electric bitters is just the thing for a man who is all run down and dont care weather he lives or dies; he found new strength, good appetite and and felt just like a new lease of life. Only 50c. a bottle, at W. A. Schreiter's Drug Store.

The Annual Rumpus.

In days of old the Annual School Meeting was looked upon as one of the most auspicious occasions of the year, and was the pivotal point upon which swug the vibrating thread of gossip for many months before and after. Here in Red Lake Falls, it seems there is still an ancient flavor about our annual school meetings—a flavor highly relished by the most exacting palate. The South Side primary room presented a strange appearance Saturday night to one studying the lighter phases of the subject that brought the crowd together. It is doubtful if our space would admit of the many amusing incidents that transpired there. Every seat was filled—the ladies had flocked there early, from every portion of the city, until Red Lake Falls grace and beauty was largely represented in that school room. The wearisome reading of the proceedings of the past year concluded, the contest for three seats on the schoolboard begun. The candidates were many: One ticket contained the names of Fred Krueger, Ed Garceau and Theo. Garceau; another, Fred Krueger, Ed Garceau and H. B. Davis; another, J. W. Rodgers, Ed Garceau and H. M. Kaus. There were 249 ballots cast. The members elected, therefore, are Fred Krueger, for two years, Ed Garceau and H. B. Davis for three years. It will be seen that one ticket went in straight. Nobody knew much about who was running until the evening of election. Dr. Watson made a unique address that proved very interesting and seemed to work on his audience intensely one way or another. The Doctor is a good extemporaneous speaker and knows how to handle his subject. Fred Gesswein also gave a few views in terse and telling style. The board elected will proceed with the erection of the new schoolhouse, an event that will be hailed with delight by every citizen. The NEWS has always preached the advantages of good educational facilities. We will soon have educational facilities in fitting proportion to the grand dimensions of our city. Altogether, it was a goodnatured contest; just a trifle enthused, here and there, but that is merely a factor in the fun of an election. The ladies all had their say and no family quarrels seem to have resulted. So here's to the school election of 1891!

County News.

A young man who had been canvassing in the vicinity of Fosston, says the Thirteen Towns, for school furniture, was arrested last week on a telegram from the chief of police of Grand Forks, on the ground of horse stealing. Deputy Sheriff Ricard Fadden arrived on Tuesday armed with a warrant from a justice there. The young man, however, refused to go back without a requisition being obtained from the governor. He had the team with him, and said he had no idea of stealing it that he had hired the team from the livery stable there, for a week, that he had written the owner not to be alarmed, that he was unable to be back as soon as he expected as he hadn't finished his canvassing out this way. The livery man nevertheless became afraid and caused his arrest. The young man never claimed around here to have owned the team, but said that it was one he had hired from a livery barn in Grand Forks. The deputy sheriff finally concluded not to go through the form for a requisition then, and started back to Grand Forks with the team Friday morning. As nothing further has been done in regard to the matter it has probably been decided by the Grand Forks authorities to drop the affair.

Cookston Times: Michel Bruilette, a farmer living near Gentilly, and his son had a very narrow escape from injory and perhaps death yesterday morning about 11 o'clock on the renowned accident crossing over the G. N. railway tracks on Robert street. They were driving toward Sampson's addition and attempted to cross the first line of track, on which the yard engine was backing a train of freight cars toward the depot, and although they were warned by Flagman Boh, they made the attempt, and a car struck the front wheels of the wagon pushing it against the depot platform, and just as the horses were being dragged under the car the train stopped. As soon as the men preceived the danger they jumped from the wagon. The train was moving quite slowly, otherwise they would not have escaped as easily. The horses were uninjured and the only damage sustained was the wagon, the front wheels of which were smashed. Agent Fegan wired headquarters full particulars of the accident with a suggestion that the company give the gentleman a new wagon, which was done yesterday afternoon. Next.

Capital Gossip.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 15 th, 1891.—Moses P. Handy, Promotor General of the Worlds Fair was in Washington a few days ago on his way to Europe in the interest of the Exposition. He was very enthusiastic over the prospects for the great show of 93. When asked what had been accomplished so far, Mr. Handy replied that it was safe to say no exposition had ever been further advanced at the same periodin its history. Contrary to general impression, he said, it is a fact that those who know most what is going on, are most impressed with the idea that it will be the greatest of Worlds Fairs. The difference between the National and state promoters and managers which cropped out at the start and lasted for some time, no longer exists. The matter of many is of course a prime consideration, and the funds at the disposal of the Board of managers he said are in a very satisfactory condition. The percentage of non-payment of subscription has been almost insignificant. There has been one million dollars in the Treasury for several months past, which is a larger amount than was in the hands of the Management of any Exposition until it was well under way. The extent of National interest in the Exposition is shown in the fact that already more than two million dollars have been appropriated by different states for state exhibits with a number of states yet to be heard from. As to the foreign out look, Major Handy says, "No nation, excepting Italy that ever took part in an International Exposition has declined to be represented, and that some which have never exhibited before will participate in this. The foreign press is now full of news, and facts and fancies about what is to be done at Chicago, while six months ago hardly a friendly or hopeful word was heard from abroad. The Paris Exposition was a big thing, but the Chicago fair will leave it far in the distance. The Frenchmen had 73 acres under roof, but Chicago will have 115 acres.

The state department has just received an interesting though sad report from United States Consul Plumacker at Maracaibo, Venezuela, relative to the water famine in that city. He relates a condition of affairs almost past relief, which to people living in countries where water is as free and plentiful as air, would seem almost incredible. The only sources of water there is rain, which collected in cisterns during wet weather usually is sufficient to tide over the dry weather, but a long drought has left the cisterns empty. As the lake water is undrinkable, when the cisterns commenced to run dry, numberless excavations were made in the outskirts In most cases the water thus found is unpalatable. But thousands of the desperate thirst-stricken people have to depend upon this abominable mixture. The city death roll has been steadily increasing for weeks, the mortality, particularly among children, being frightful. The government has declared the situation to be a public calamity, and is doing all in its power to alleviate the universal suffering among the poor who cannot purchase even the unwholesome liquid that is collected in these holes in the ground, and which is all that is obtainable. Add to this, Consul Plumacker says, an intense heat, and the present situation in Maracaibo may be feeby understood. He tells a touching story of the scenes about the wells and holes of women and children standing in a long and sad procession gazing alternately at the heavens and into the bottom of the holes, imploring God to give them water to drink and to restore their health.

Gentilly News

Married, Monday, July 20, by Rev. Fr. Theillion, Mr. Louis Trudeau to Miss Zerephina Desgrosseillier. The wedding breakfast was taken at the residence of the bride. A dance was held in the evening where a great crowd of friends were assembled. Miss D. was a favorite among her friends. The happy couple will go to housekeeping in Gentilly. Happy wishes.

DON'T WORRY.

There are times and seasons in every life,
Not excepting a favored few,
When not to worry over the strife
Is the hardest thing to do.
When all things seem so dark and drear
We fear they may darker be,
Forgetting to trust and not to fear,
Though we cannot the future see.

Each life has its good to be thankful for.
We must trust we may always find
Some happiness surely, less or more,
Some peace for troubled mind.
Let us try the good in our minds to fit,
Passing over the ills in a hurry,
For when we really think of it,
What good ever comes of worry?

We must bear our trials cheerfully,
Not burden our world with sorrow
Because we are anxious, and fearfully
Are looking for trouble to borrow.
Look into the future with hopeful heart,
Keep a watch for the silver lining,
And the cloud of trouble will surely part,
If we trust instead of repining.

—Good Housekeeping.

THE TRICKSTER TRICKED.

On the banks of the beautiful Potomac river, near Baltimore, arose the majestic walls of Professor Melville H. Plunkerville's Academy for young gentlemen" as the advertisement read.

The aforesaid professor was a genial, whole-souled man whose chief desire was to found a college for the youth of the land, and to carry this out he had spared no pains or money to make it an institution to be proud of; and now, three years after the school was founded, it not only was known as a first-class academy, but had the finest corps of tutors in the country,

The rich aristocrat sent his son there; the struggling merchant also sent his son there; and, in fact, representatives of all classes mingled together on terms of equality.

On a beautiful morning in May, as the birds were sending out stream after stream of beautiful melody, causing the balmy atmosphere to resound again and again with its sweetness, a ripple of excitement ran throughout the recitation room. All the pupils were seated, waiting in breathless anticipation something of importance the professor had to say.

After the room had remained so silent that a pin could have been heard to drop, the Professor slowly arose, wiped his spectacles and carefully placing them on the bridge of his nose, he began:

"Boys, I wish to speak to you for some moments, in regard to some things occurring in this school.

"For several months past, a number of pupils have had articles of various kinds taken from their rooms.

"We have watched and watched for the thief, and so far we have been unsuccessful in our efforts to find him.

"Now, as I do not want this academy to gain a bad reputation, I will offer the following reward:

"To any person, whether in or out of school, who shall bring to our knowledge the person who has been guilty of these thefts, we will give one year's tuition, and $500 additional. This is all I have to say on the subject. You will now please give attention to your tutors."

As the Professor finished his remarks a momentary bubble of excitement went through the lecture-room, but it was instantly quelled by the tutors.

The tutors might as well have tried to teach an elephant to climb a tree, as to get the pupils' attention after that.

In vain they expostulated; in vain they gave pages, and hundreds of words to commit to memory. Try as hard as they would to make them pay attention to their books, it was useless. Hardly had their eyes been fixed upon their book, before they would be dreamily gazing out at the window; no doubt thinking of the great reward. After an hour of this kind of attention, the tutors were forced to dismiss school as they saw the excitement had driven all thoughts of their lessons out of their pupils' minds.

One by one the boys left the room, and at last only one boy remained—a boy of 17 who, though poor, was at the head of his class. This was Joshua Semple, who lived with his widowed mother and sister in a little cottage, close by the school.

After all the rest of the scholars had gone, Joshua went up to his tutor's desk and said: "Professor Brown, I think I will have to leave the school."

"Why so, Joshua?" said Professor Brown.

"Well," said Joshua, "my mother finds that she can no longer let me attend school, because the money which our Uncle John left us is all gone, and at present there is not enough money in the house to last a month. I have decided, therefore, to leave school and try to get employment."

"I am very sorry to hear of it," said the warm-hearted professor, "but couldn't you come to school just one month more? I think that you can manage to graduate then."

"Although I would like to come to school that long, yet I don't think I will be able to do so. I will come until I get a situation, however," answered Joshua.

The appetizing odor of roast beef and home-made bread came pouring out through the open door. Within was a middle-aged lady engaged in dissecting a part of the anatomy of a cow, and then rolling these dissected parts in crushed crackers. She put them into the spider, and soon they were sizzing and sputtering at a great rate.

At the sink stood as pretty a specimen of young American girldom as could be found. She was washing the dishes. Every little while she would look up to the clock, wondering why it was so slow getting round to 4 o'clock.

Just as she had finished the last dish, the clock began to strike, and simultaneously the door was dashed open and in came Joshua, with a whoop and yell! "Regular as a clock," cried Joshua's mother—of course you understand that the lady and girl engaged in the house work are Joshua's mother and sister.

"What news Josh," said his mother; "anything extraordinary turned up?"

"Well nothing very extra, only Professor Plunkerville has offered a year's tuition and $500 for any one that catches the thief who is making our school such a bad reputation. I'm going to try and catch the thief. Just think of it, a year's tuition and $500! If we only had the $500 now, we could buy old Silas Adams' general store. He is going to Baltimore to start a big store and he'll let us have his place just as it is now, for one-half what it cost him. If we only had the store we could easily make enough to live on!" cried Josh, quite carried away with the enthusiasm of the moment.

As Joshua was going to the academy next morning, his thoughts were only on the reward, and he failed to observe where he was until he found himself lying flat upon his back, having stumbled over some obstacle in the path. He looked down and discovered that the obstacle was a rope stretched between two trees. He took out his knife and was just going to cut the rope, when he heard a laugh, and looking in the direction from which it came, he saw three boys nearly doubled up with merriment.

"Ho! ho!" laughed Bob Ellis, "that's one on you," and then Bob let out another thunderous roar, followed immediately by his two colleagues—Tom White and Al Aston.

Josh by this time had got into such a fury that it was all he could do to restrain himself from rushing upon the young rogues.

"What do you mean by playing such a mean measly trick on me!" cried Joshua. "Do you know that you could have caused me to hurt myself severely?"

"Serves you right, for you ought to look where you're going," answered Bob between his smirks, and then, unable to contain his mirth, he nearly doubled himself up again and lay on the ground "Haw-hawing" for all he was worth!

"Well, anyhow, I'll see that you don't fool any other person by it. I am going to cut the rope in two," cried Josh, so angry that he could hardly speak.

"Here, let that rope alone," yelled Bob, as Josh took out his knife, "that rope belongs to me, and its none of your business what I do with it!"

"I don't care whose it is; anyhow, you won't fool anybody else with it, and here goes." Snap went the rope.

"I'll have you arrested for this," yelled Bob. "Come on, boys let's lick him for cutting our rope!"

"Come on," answered Josh, "I'm ready for you."

Rob and his pals advanced towards Josh with tightly clenched hands. It looked as if Josh was in for it, sure this time.

Josh stood coolly surveying the three ruffians, and Bob, after looking at him for a moment, whispered something to his pals, which seemed to meet their approval. Bob and his ruffians faced Josh again. Hardly a moment elasped before Bob aimed a sudden blow at Josh's head. But Josh was prepared for this, and no sooner had Bob aimed the blow than it was neatly parried, and the next moment Bob was lying howling on his back, with a perceptible swelling on his upper lip Something rolled out of Bob's pocket and Josh saw it. Bob's pals closed in on Josh, but some of the students of the college attracted by the noise, came upon the scene and held Josh's assailant's back. Just then who should appear but Professor Plunkerville. He took in the scene immediately. "What is the meaning of this conduct, young gentlemen?" he said sharply. "How is it that I find you, Joshua, participating in this disgraceful scene? Explain your conduct, sir!" and the professor fairly shook with rage.

"Please, sir," whined Bob, "Josh assaulted me and my friends with a board."

"He's lying! he's lying!" shouted the students who had witnessed the encounter.

"Silence!" commander she Professor, and a pin-drop silence instantly prevailed.

"Now, then, Joshua," continued the Professor, "how did this happen?"

"These ruffians, sir, placed a rope across the path, and when I came along I fell over it. They then began to laugh. I took out my knife and was going to cut the rope when they objected. I cut the rope for I didn't want any one else to become victims of their tricks. They then jumped on me and that brings the case up to the present moment," answered Josh.

"Go home, all of you. I'll attend to this to-morrow," said the Professor.

Bob slowly got up on his feet and proceeded to air his version of the affair to the students.

Josh by some impulse went where he had seen something fall out of Bob's pocket.

Moving the grass aside he searched closely and there he saw something shining. He picked it up—it was a pair of gold spectacles. Instantly he decided that Bob was the thief.

Professor! Professor!" running after the Professor.

"What is it Joshua?" answered the Professor when Josh had reached him, breathless.

"Are those your spectacles?" said Josh.

The Professor looked at them a moment and then he said, "Yes, Josh, these are mine. They were stolen from me some nights ago. Where did you get them?"

"They fell out of Bob's pocket," said Josh. A village constable passed just then and the Professor instructed him to arrest Bob.

Bob resisted, but the law had a grip on him, and he desisted. After a stubborn silence he broke down and confessed that he had been guilty of all the thefts, assisted by his pals.

Ten years after, a wild excitement ran through the county. A Senator was to be chosen, and after a hot fight Mr. Joshua Semple, owner of the largest mills in the county, was elected. Now I close with ending of L. M. Alcott: "They all lived happily until they died."—Texas Farm and Ranch.

Digestibility of Cucumber.

Many people are under the impression that cucumber is very indigestible; and when they eat it they do so under protest, and with apprehensions of possibly dire consequences. How this delusion can have arisen it is difficult to say, unless it be that cucumber is often eaten with salmon and other indigestible table fruits. It is not the cucumber, however, but the salmon, that sits so heavily on our stomach's throne. Cucumber, in fact, is very digestible when eaten properly. It cannot, indeed, be otherwise when it is remembered that it consists mainly of water, and that those parts which are not water are almost exclusively cells of a very rapid growth. In eating cucumber, it is well to cut it into thin slices and to masticate them thoroughly. Even the vinegar and the pepper that are so often added to it are of service to digestion if not taken in excess.

VERY RAPID TELEGRAPHY.

Three Thousand Words Per Minute Transmitted Over a Copper Wire.

A recent paper by Mr. Gisborne, of Ottawa electrician to the Dominion, given at the recent meeting of the Royal Society of Canada in Montreal, contains some very interesting statements about rapid telegraphy. Mr. Gisborn stated by way of data that 3,000 words per minute had been transmitted by a round-about line of copper wire 355 miles long between New York and Washington, while 800 had been reached over the 1,000 mile line between New York and Chicago, and he expressed the opinion that the telegraph of the future would be largely conducted by means of such rapid transmitters as were used in these experiments. It may be interesting to note that the automatic machine telegraph employment is the invention of Mr. F. Anderson, of Connecticut, and that it is of the perforated paper class of instruments, registering each message by ink marks showing the ordinary Morse signals.

From this the speaker went on to show that a message of 100 words could be transmitted over 1,000 miles of line for 25 cents, and yet allow a large profit for the telegraph companies. Such a statement may appear a little surprising at first sight, but it must be remembered that a pair of lines working at the highest speed mentioned is the equivalent of something like forty complete quadruplex systems, each requiring its own wire, and worked by the ordinary key.

The decrease in expense of line and maintenance accomplished by the substitution of these transmitters for the ordinary instruments would be something enormous, to say nothing of the far smaller number of operators and instruments required. The perforation, of course, is done by machines constructed on the principle of the typewriter.

FORTUNES IN ELECTRICITY.

The Scientific Body That Has the Largest Number of Millionaires.

Lucre has smiled on the explorers in the field of electrical science. No scientific body in the country has so many millionaires as the American Institute of Electrical Engineers. At the top of the list is Alexander Graham Bell, whose profits on the telephone are represented by eight figures. Next comes Edison with a seven figure fortune. Brush, of electric light fame, and Elihu Thomson, whose financial future is perhaps brighter than any of the others just now, are more than millionaires.

Frank J. Sprague was a junior officer in the United States Navy six years ago. He is now living in the mansion which was built for the Grants. His company sold out to the Edison Company for $1,000,000, and half of it went to the inventor. Franklin L. Pope, of New York, and a score of others have independent fortunes. Most of these men were telegraph operators, and most of them began their experimenting and study without a dollar.—St Louis Globe Democrat.

Swallows Supplant Carrier Pigeons.

An intersting account has lately appeared of an experiment made in the north of France in the training of swallows as carriers and in testing the swallows so trained by competition with carrier pigeons. A brood of young swallows having been taken from their nest in the eaves of a house, were first trained to fly from the ground to the nest; then by gradually increasing stages, from Ronbaix to Lile, and finally from Ronbaix to Paris, a distance of 140 miles. When this had been successfully accomplished, a race was arranged over the latter course between the swallows and some trained carrier pigeons, with the result that the swallows came in winners by three quarters of an hour. The success of the experiment seems to reveal great possibilities for the future of this method of rapid communication.—Land and Water.

ROBBING THE SHOPKEEPERS

A Trick That Is Very Often Successfully Practiced In Paris.

The shop front trick is more skillful than any played off upon the poor shopkeeper in Paris, says the New York Herald. A man in the garb of a peasant may be seen making his way along the street, carrying with difficulty a heavy bag upon his head. Just opposite the shop of a linen draper or milliner he staggers beneath the burden and falls heavily against the shop window, allowing his bag to crash through the large plate of glass. The proprietor, of course, rushes out and energetically demands that the damage be paid for on the spot. The rustic, with equal vehemence, protests that he cannot and will not pay, and an altercation ensues, in which the shopman seems to be getting anything but the best of it.

At this juncture there steps out from the crowd which has collected a well-dressed man who intervenes in the discussion and asserts that he knows the peasant and is quite sure that he can afford to pay. The latter, with many oaths and much reluctance, gives in before this evidence, and at length produces grumblingly from his pocket a Bank of France note for 1,000 francs. The shopkeeper, overjoyed at the sight of it, and nothing loath to settle the business and get rid of the concourse of people, quickly pockets the note, gives the man his change after deducting the full value of the glass, and with thanks to the stranger, withdraws from the scene. But on going some time afterward to exchange the bank note for gold, he finds that it is a bad one.

AN IMPORTANT BILL.

The Royal Baking Powder Condemned in the New York Legislature.

[New York Press.]

Last Monday Mr. Kelly introduced the following bill in the assembly. A careful reading of it will show that it is a very important one.

AN ACT to prevent the use of poisonous and injurious ingredients in baking powders.

WHEREAS, Baking Powders manufactured in this state, known as the "ROYAL" alum and other Baking Powders are advertised for sale as absolutely pure; and,

WHEREAS, Official examination show them to contain ammonia and other injurious ingredients; therefore THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1.—Every can or package of baking powder containing Ammonia offered for sale in this State shall have a conspicuous label thereon with the words "Contains Ammonia" printed thereon in plain type, not smaller than great primer and any person who shall sell, or offer for sale, any such can or package of baking powder without such label thereon, shall be guilty of misdemeanor.

Who Knows Whom He Will Marry

Young men think they know just what kind of a woman they will marry, and they are sure that they will marry no other. The result is apt to prove them very much in error as to what they think they will do and will not do. They marry—most men marry some time—but two chances to three they marry a very different lady from the kind they have always dilated upon. A young man who has pertinaciously insisted that he will only marry a brunette will, in the end marry a blonde. A young man who has always felt and said that he would marry only a blonde is very likely to marry a brunette. Such things come out very funnily. A pug nose has been the horror of a youthful sprig of fashion, and he has been heard many times to express his sentiments on that subject. Five years after, he is seen proudly escorting a pug-nosed wife! Another could never bear a "dumpy" woman. He, after all, selects for a wife the fattest little woman he has ever known. A third likes robust women, and always has a dislike of the lean-and-lank order. By and by, the tallest woman in the town has his surname, with a "Mrs." prefixed to it. You can tell better about the weather afterwards than before; so you can tell better after marriage than before what kind of a woman was to be your wife.

Fashion's Cruelty to Children.

"Speaking of these fads," said a bystander, "the yatchtsman business seems to have the pull this summer. Every woman who has a youngster and any money goes out and rigs the kid up in a full naval uniform. I saw one woman dragging an unhappy bit of progeny not over 4 years of age along State street and the little one was made up in all the magnificent of an admiral of the British squadron. He had anchors on his cap, anchors and bars on his sleeve, and more anchors and stars and things on his collar. His pants were wide enough at the bottom to pull him through them, and he had long, yellow hair, a relic of last season's Fauntleroy craze, which I suppose his dear mother couldn't bear to cut off. I pitied the kid—I did, indeed. They're afraid to leave 'mamma' for an instant, for a make-up like that is to a good, healthy street gamein as a red flag to a bull, and one of these sailor boys takes long chances if he's left unprotected.—Chicago Times.

H A FISH.

nd a Big Gamy

"Take it in!" said my companion, excitedly, and bending to the work I brought the line in, fighting for every inch that came; when the Mexican shouted a warning. Whizz! and the coils leaped again into the air. Nothing could withstand the rush—a header directly for the bottom and away.

The anchor had been hauled up by the Mexican at the first strike, and now, with line in hand, we were off, the boat churning through the water, hurling the spray over us, and bearing waves of gleaming foam ahead.

"Take in!" cries Joe, who stands by the coil, and again, slowly fighting against the dull blows, the line comes in. Ten feet gained, and whizz-eee! as many more are lost. In it comes once more, hand over hand, the holder of the line bending this way and that, trying to preserve a balance and that tension which would prevent a sudden break. Now the fish darts to one side, tearing the water into foam, leaving a sheet of silvery bubbles, and swinging the boat around as on a pivot. Now it is at the surface—a fleeting vision followed by a rush that carries the very gunwale under water. This, followed by a sudden slacking of the line, sends despair to the heart: he is gone, the line floats. No, whizz! and away again, down. All the tricks of the sturdy black bass this giant of the tribe indulges in, except the mid-air leaps which gladden the heart of the angler. Quick turns, downward rushes, powerful blows, mighty runs this gamy creature makes, fighting inch by inch, leaving an impression upon the mind of the fisherman that is not soon forgotten.

With a large rope, and by taking turns, the fish could have been mastered, but such methods were not considered sportsmanlike here. It must be taken freehanded, a fight at arm's-length, and being such, the moments fly by; it is half an hour, and we have not yet seen the outline of our game. Gradually the rushes grow less, the blows are lighter, and what is taken is all gain.—Scribner.

A FIGHT WITH A RATTLER.

Desperate Struggle of a Negro With the Venomous Reptile.

Thomas Jenkins, a hard working negro, who is fond of hunting, and who owns a small farm near Opelika, Ala., recently had a terrible adventure with a large rattle-snake, which he succeeded in killing only after it had bitten him twice.

Jenkins was at work removing the debris of an old out-building, when the snake sounded its rattle almost under his feet. He sprang back just in time to escape the dart of the reptile, and struck at it with the small hand axe he carried, but was so unfortunate as to miss it entirely, when the snake with incredible rapidity coiled itself about his leg. He endeavored to throw it off, when it buried its fangs in the fleshy part of the limb. Before it could withdraw them he seized it back of the head and choked it, as he thought, to death, for its folds relaxed, and he was able to fling it from him, but upon reaching the ground, the reptile revived and turned again to the attack. Jenkins again endeavored to kill it by a stroke of his axe, but only succeeded in severing the extreme tip of the tail, and the next instant the writhing creature had struck him on the ankle, when he brought the blade down upon it, cutting it entirely in two.

Calling his wife to assist him, Jenkins managed to reach a physician living near him, whose immediate attention to his two wounds probably saved his life. The limb is much swollen and of a livid blue, but no danger is anticipated. The wounds were in both instances deprived of their full deadliness by Jenkins' heavy trousers and stockings, which absorbed much of the poison and thus prevented its entrance into the body. The snake was an old one of unusual size and carried the extraordinary number of thirty-seven rattles. These reptiles are unusually numerous in this vicinity this year, the one killed by Jenkins being the 100th killed in one week.—Globe-Democrat

COLORING OF FISHES.

Explanation of the Cause of Coloring of Fishes.

Various explanations have been suggested for the fact that most flat fish have the dorsal or upper surface colored, and the ventral or lower surface white. It has been said that the white ventral surface protects the fish, for the surrounding water with the light shining through it has about the same tint, and so an enemy floating below and looking up, could not distinguish him. Recent interesting experiments, to discover the influence of sunlight on the color of flat fish, are noted in the Revue Scientifique.

Having placed a few young fish in a glass vessel, the experimenter covered the sides and top of the vessel, placed it on a support, and beneath it so arranged a mirror that the sunlight was reflected into the water, and illuminated the ventral faces of the fish while the dorsal faces were in darkness.

The natural conditions were thus reversed. The water was frequently changed, and the fish were well fed. At the same time similar fish were placed in a glass vessel, and exposed to the light in the usual.

The result was that out of thirty fish exposed to the sunlight from below, onlp three remained like those in the ordinary glass vessel, and the others developed greater or less quantities of pigment cells on the ventral face. This indicates that light has an important influence on the color of animals, but it evidently is not the only influence to be considered, since some animals whose habitat is dark have color.

A MATERIAL SAVING DEVISE.

The Extreme of Economy in Wire Fence Building.

One-half the usual number of Fence Posts, one-half the number of staples, and one-fourth the time and labor is saved to the farmer by a very simple and strong device, patented to John B. Cleveland, a practical farmer and fence builder of Indianapolis, Ind., on the 24th, of last March. It holds a 60 rod stretch of any make of fence wire, is a wire stretcher, tightener, tension adjuster, and a common wrench operates it. It has been named the LOYAL FENCE WIRE LOCK, and has been christened by a sale of over 60,000 in less than 90 days, through the hardware trade. Mr. Cleveland is letting his contract for sole manufacture and exclusive sale, exacted a heavy bond limiting the retail price at ten cents, so that the Loyal Lock might become generally used, and every farmer build his own Patent Fence at a great saving in material and cost.

Pearls in Oysters.

The pearl oyster is a valued member of the family. Some produce pearl for buttons and ornamentation, and some the gem. The latter is simply a result of the oyster's attempt to protect itself from some foreign substance. Thus, if a minute grain of sand finds its way into the shell, the animal will immediately envelope it with a nacreous of pearly coating, which if continued results in a perfect gem. The pearls attached to the shells and layers of nacre heaped up to prevent the onward march of a boring parasite seeking entrance from without. In Ceylon 17,000,000 pearl oysters were destroyed lately to produce $80,000 in pearls.—San Francisco Chronicle.

WOMAN'S REAL KINGDOM.

CAN NOT THE UNITED STATES BOAST IT AFTER ALL?

A Story That It Has Been Discovered in the Middle of Sumatra—The Women have All the Wealth and Their Own Way.

If Mr. W. J. Shaw tells the whole truth and nothing but the truth, then the United States does not deserve the title of "Woman's Kingdom," or "Woman's Paradise," or any of the other similar names which have been bestowed upon it, says the Philadelphia Times. Mr. Shaw has discovered a place where women hold a position in comparison with which their status in the United States is one of shame and servitude. Mr. Shaw was one of the forty-niners in San Francisco. He came here from New York, and was a lawyer, a State Senator, and a man of importance and public worth in the early days, until he left the country to spend years and years in travel in out-of-the-way places. This woman's most paradisical paradise is in Sumatra, in the interior of the island.

"The women there own all the wealth," he says, "and it is the constant aim of the men to enrich their wives. They have a law by which a man's property cannot be inherited by his children, but must go to his parents, while that belonging to his wife desends to the offspring; and, of course, they get around that law by putting all their wealth into the hands of the women.

"Each man has but one wife and each wife one husband, and they live perfectly moral lives. They are Mohammedans although they are monogamous, both in theory and in fact. A man may divorce his wife if he chooses, but he must allow her to retain the property in her possession. Divorces are not frequent, not nearly as frequent in proportion to population as they are in California.

"A man does not live in the same house as his wife. He has his home apart and visits her only in the evening, like a lover calling on his mistress. When the children grow up the boys are taken away from their mother's home as soon as they are old enough, but the girls stay with her until they marry. When that event takes place an addition is built on to the mother's establishment and the newly married daughter makes that her home. Where there are many daughters the original house grows and grows, as they are married off, until it becomes almost a village.

When a woman's husband dies she plants a post in front of her particular door in the family mansion and hangs a flag on it. As long as that flag waves she may not marry again. But when the winds have torn it into shreds and scattered the bits on the ground, her term of mourning is considered to be over and she may accept a second lover's advances. What is wanted in Sumatra more than anything else is a material for flags that will be more susceptible to the action of the elements than anything they have now.

"The women are very beautiful, having good figures, exceedingly fine complexions, and bright eyes. And they dress most elegantly and extravagantly. They have both silver and gold mines in the island, and these people have sufficient knowledge of the arts to smelt and draw the ingots into fine wire, which they then weave into cloth for dresses.

While I was there I saw two pretty, bright-eyed maidens dressed just as they would be on their wedding days, which were to come off soon. One wore a dress of this cloth of gold and the other of silver, and they were just the most resplendent damsels you ever saw. Their arms were covered with bracelets from the hand to far above the elbow, and their necks with necklaces of gems and gold.

"Oh, American women are supposed to be treated better than women anywhere else, and to have a sort of heaven here in com[illegible] sisters elsewhere, [illegible] aren't in it at all beside the women over in the middle of Sumatra."

EXTINCT ANIMAL SPECIES.

It Is a Very Difficult Job to Exterminate Them Entirely.

When people set about getting rid of an entire species of animals by a systematic persecution, they usually find it a difficult job. Set a price on the head of the wolf or the woodchuck and the creature seems to realize the importance of its life. A bounty on crows must be viewed as a pleasant joke by those shrewd observers of men and things. The case of the wolf in Europe is an historical one. A price has been set on the creature's head for centuries, and yet there is but a small portion of the continent from which the animal has been exterminated. The Netherlands is free from wolves from the character of the country. The whole land furnishes not a single rocky den suitable for the wolfs lair; neither is there a forest for the creatures shelter.

It is true that the wolf has been exterminated from Great Britain and Ireland. This result has been reached, however, by indirect means rather than by direct attack. The clearing off of the forest left the wolf no place in which to hide from pursuit. The islands were too far from the continent for their thinned ranks to be recruited from the main land.

In Spain and France the wolf has at no time been unknown, although a price has been set on its head for hundreds of years. The animal has developed cunning in proportion as the pursuit has become closer. Like the crow, it has learned to take care of itself.

On the other hand, species receive very little help toward their continuance from the well-meant efforts of man to that end. In proof of this we were told that there is an ancient act of parliament still in force in England and Wales, prohibiting the taking of the eggs of certain birds, of which six kinds are expressly named. In spite of this protecting law, four of the six species have ceased to breed in those countries.

The indirect ways in which such results are brought about are shown in the destruction of the quail in New Zealand. The birds were once numerous; no one wished to destroy them. But the land was burned over for other purposes at seasons when the eggs and young of the quail were exposed to destruction and a few years brought the species to an end.—Youth's Companion.

A Locomotive Steamboat.

Sweden goes ahead of the world in the matter of ship railways with a curious affair that resembles a cross between a locomotive and a steamboat. The vessel is intended to travel on a river in which there is a waterfall, and in order to circumvent this a railway track has been laid with a steep incline. The vessel mounts this track and travels on wheels fitted along the sides and worked by its own engines.

She "Parsed" Butter.

Among the guests at an Eastern mountain resort, where the waiters are all Massachusetts school ma'ams, was a Texas man who was not noted for grammatical accuracy in speaking. One day he said to a waiter, "Miss, will you pars that butter?" "Butter," said the school ma'am promptly, "is a noun; common noun, because is a name of a thing and a very poor thing, too, sometimes; singular number, when strong enough to go alone; feminine gender, as indicated by the long hairs often found in it, and judging from the objections raised by boarders to eating it; in the objective case, subject to oleomargarine understood." The Texas man said he guessed he would try and get along without butter if that was what ailed it.—Kansas City Journal.

PROTECT OUR BREAD.

The machinery of the law has not been put to work too speedily against the fraudulent use of ammonia and alum in Baking Powders. Both health and the pocket of the people are demanding protection. The legislatures of New York, Illinois and Minnesota have taken this matter of adulteration up, and especially that of Baking Powders. It will be in the interest of public health when their sale is made a misdemeanor in every State in the UNION, and the penalties of the law are rigidly enforced. There is no article of human food more wickedly adulterated than that of Baking Powder.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is the only pure cream of tartar powder having a general sale that is free from ammonia, alum or taint of any kind of impurity. It makes the sweetest and lightest bread, biscuit and cake that are perfectly digestible whether hot or cold. It costs more to manufacture Dr. Price's than any other baking powder. It is superior to every other known and the standard for forty years.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from Ammonia, Alum, or any other adulterant. In fact, the purity of this ideal powder has never been questioned.

DOWNFALL OF BISMARCK.

A Little Inside History by Dr. Geffcken.

When the late Emperor Frederick of Germany died, it will be recalled that portions of his diary, kept in 1873, were published, which showed the hesitating part played by Bismarck in the Franco-Prussian war. Intense excitement followed this publication, and Dr. Geffcken was arrested on criminal proceedings on the ground of falsification if the diary was not genine, and for revealing state secrets if the diary was genuine. On this two-edged indictment he was tried, but acquitted with the censure of the court.

To this Dr. Geffcken, now Imperial Privy Councillor, submitted quietly and awaited his turn, which soon came in the fall of Bismarck.

And the story of the fall of Bismarck, with greater detail than it has ever before been published, at least for English readers, Dr. Geffcken now tells in the July number of The Forum. The Iron Chacellor had, naturally perhaps, assumed that his long and valuable service and his great influence (amounting in many matters of State to control) over the old Emperor William and his retention during his brief reign by Frederick would insure his continued power under the young William II. Not only this, but he had for many years so conducted Imperial affairs and so disposed of men about him as to make young Bismarck his successor, aiming to establish an hereditary chan ellorship.

From this high pinnacle of achievement and of expectation his sudden and unexpected dismissal is one of the most dramatic incidents in political history.

The central idea in the critical review of Bismarck's career, made by Dr. Geffcken in this article, is set forth in the following extract:

The true test of the highest order of statesmanship is its degree of success in forming a school. Such statesmen were Pericles, Cæsar, Charlemagne, Lord Chatham, Washington, Pitt, Stein, and in our days, Cavour. When they died they left successors able to continue their work, and the reason is that they believe in institutions rather than in men. . . . With Bismarck in was the reverse; he always adhered to the Cæsarian system—the "one man" who undertakes to think for the whole people. To govern was, according to his idea, not to persuade, but to command, and representative government was to command with a flourish of speeches, which should always end in a subserviency to the ruling minister. In fact, his opinion was, "L' Empire c' est moi," and enemies of the Empire were always those who opposed his policy of the hour, his imperious nature rebelling against all control. Such a man could form no school; as soon as he saw a rising talent he pressed it into his service or crushed it. Therefore when he was dismissed, Germany had able diplomatists and administrators, but no statesmen.

He represented the corruption as well as the absolutist tendency of an order of monarchy that is now everywhere dead except in Russia.

On the other hand, the young Emperor, as described by Geffcken, in spite of his strongly military utterances, recognizes the fact that he is a constitutional monarch. An outline of the portrait of him, drawn by his Privy Councillor, is as follows.

William II, is undoubtedly the most remarkable sovereign of the present time. He is a modern man, notwithstanding certain proclivities which still adhere to him, like pieces of the shell of an egg from which the bird has issued. With restless activity he seizes upon all questions which agitate our time, be they large or small. Today he speaks on great European affairs, opens new issues to German commerce, and proclaims social reform; tomorrow he opens an art exhibition and takes a personal part in the performance of Wildenbruch's patriotic drama, "The New Lord." He presides over his Council and shows himself a ready debater, opens a scholastic conference, laying down his educational plans, and indefatigably travels all over his country in order to see everything with his own eyes. Much in all this may be attributed to his active temper, but the moving principle is undoubtedly the high conception of his duty as "the first servant of the state." This conception is bound up with a strong consciousness of his eminent position; he feels himself to be the pillar of the state called to carry out a great mission. As before the dismissal of Bismarck he said that he would crush any one trying to obstruct his path, so he declared in his last speech at Dusseldorf: "Only one is master in this country; I shall suffer no other." It would be unjust to see in such utterances, caused by high consciousness of his power, absolutist tendencies on the part of the Emperor! He is a constitutional prince and has rigidly respected parliamentary rights. But in a time when the principle of authority and order is undermined in many ways, the youthful sovereign feels that he is the centre of monarchical discipline, without which the State can neither exist nor progress, and he is resolved to maintain his authority against Social Democrats as well as against interested coalitions of privileged classes and persons.—The Forum.

Mr. John Johnson, a man of this class, was desirous to be known as of a literary turn, and to that end proceeded to lay in a library. One of his purchases was an old dictionary which, being somewhat out of repair, was sent to the binder's.

When it was returned to the purchaser, he found printed on its back the words "Johnson's Dictionary." The slight threw him into a furious passion, and he demanded of the messenger: "Why didn't he put the full name on, 'John Johnson's Dictionary?'"

IN A NEW BOARDING HOUSE.

First of All, Be Sure the Servant Girl Knows Your Face.

"The other day Colonel Nat McKay referred me to a very nice boarding house on Madison square," said a newspaper friend, "and I went over, secured the rooms and sent my trunks up. That was on Saturday. I had a late assignment and didn't go home Saturday night. Got wet on Sunday, and finally turned up about Sunday evening, looking, I confess, somewhat soiled and bedraggled. I had a friend with me to whom I had been bragging about my new rooms. Not yet having been provided with a night key I rang the bell.

"'Well, now—what do you want?" was the greeting of the maid who opened the door.

"My friend laughed, but retreated down one step. I was too much taken back to reply promptly. The girl had the floor.

"'Go 'long away with you!' she snapped, and slamed the door in my face.

"Here was a dilemma. My friend suggested that perhaps I had mistaken the number, but I was certain I had not. The girl had never seen me before. But to be taken for a tramp was funny. So we sat down on the steps and laughed in unison. Then I went up and yanked the door bell some more.

"'I tell you you can't get nothin' here! Go 'way you lazy, good for nothin' —'er I'll call the —here's an officer now!

"The only case I ever knew where a policeman was on the spot. He must have been under the stoon. But there he was, and I said with all my reportorial diplomacy, 'I live here.'

"'He don't! exclaimed the excited girl.

"'Come, come, now, you fellers, move on, move, on,' said the bluecoat, coming threateningly up the steps.

"'Will you be good enough to call the landlady?' I inquired, laughing in spite of my self. 'I moved in my trunks yesterday—the girl doesn't know me.

"'All at once a gleam of intelligence came into the girl's face. 'Oh! is this Mr.——? why goodness gracious! Why didn't you say so?" said she, throwing open the door. Now, what do you think of that for a reception?" N. Y. Herald.

TEN MINUTES TO TWELVE

By M. G. McCLELLAND.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]

should see him, and also in order to make the business arrangements necessary for an absence of uncertain duration. The time now appointed for the settlement of Miss Royal's estate was the October term of circuit court for the district wherein was situated her landed property. It was now nearing the end of September, and Royal wished a short time to himself for consultation with his wife. He had determined to be guided entirely by her wishes in the matter, feeling that she had been drawn into a false position, and that choice of a mode of extrication was her right. If she should decide on divorcing the living man for the sake of the dead man he would place no impediments in her way. But, while he formed this resolution with all stoutness, Royal was conscious of an ache at his heart which was earnest of what the wrench would be should Phyllis decide to break the bond between them.

"I'm not so sure about that as I'd like to be, Madge," Royal responded ruefully. "The balance is about even. I shall try to, at all events."

"You'll succeed, too, if you try in th right way, sir knight of the sorrowful countenance. One of the first principles [illegible] ity to [illegible] n't's a good one. [illegible] and [illegible] do. If you love her truly and want her, tell her so as strongly as you can, and don't listen to a word against it. That's the way to manage women. Be masterful through earnest loving."

"That sounds forcible," Royal admitted. "Let me in, my love, or I'll pull the place about your ears, is as good a screed of doctrine as any other in ordinary cases. In this, however, I am at a disadvantage and can't exactly avail myself of trenchant methods."

"How at a disadvantage?"

Her tone was one of eager interest.

"It's too long a story to tell now, Madge. I made a fool of myself last December—as usual. Wait until I come home with my arms borne before me or trailing a broken pennon. You shall have the story in either event, I promise you."

"You must bring it to me on the point of a victorious lance," she smiled; "any other method will rob it of all charm. There is a time worn proverb anent faint hearts and fair ladies I might quote, but will spare you. Hart!"—with a swift change of expression—"I am consumed with terror lest you forget to notify me in time about the young woman's taste in wedding gifts. If you do I shall get something perfectly atrocious!"

Royal made a jesting reply and went on his way insensibly cheered. His sister's confidence in his prowess and good fortune inspirited him and caused his natural buoyancy to reassert itself. So thoroughly did self confidence return, indeed, that during a few hours' detention in St. Louis he provided himself with a pretty moss agate pin for Mrs. Hart and a diamond ring and bracelet for Phyllis.

During the journey eastward Royal conceived, elaborated and discarded so many interviews with his wife, and of such diverse forms and endings, that his imagination developed rapidly under the exercise. Had he been called on at any moment he could have furnished a dozen thrilling and impossible situations and still have had power remaining to evolve others—brand new and infinitely more complicated. And, as events in this life rarely justify anticipations, not a single one of the predicted situations at all fitted the reality.

An hour after his arrival in Alexandria Royal left the hotel and proceeded to Mrs. Hart's house with the avowed intention of demanding an interview with that genial lady and, from her, ascertaining how the land lay. So filled was he with this scheme—which appeared to him neat—that when the servant, in response to his inquiry, informed him that Mrs. Hart had gone over to Washington and would not return until the afternoon he felt as nonplussed as though he had led an ace and had it trumped in the first round.

"Was Mrs. Royal in?"

The servant thought not, but would go and see. Then she ushered him into the parlor and retired with a grinning countenance. She had had substantial cause to regard Dr. Royal with favor during his former visit.

Royal moved restlessly about the room It was full of signs of feminine occupancy—pretty bric-a-brac, dainty embroideries, an open piano with a lace handkerchief on the keys, a fancy work basket heaped with scraps of silk and ribbon, and dolls of all sizes in various stages of preparation for a church fair, an open copy of "Hypatia" on a little table, and books here, there and everywhere.

The street door opened and closed; quick footsteps advanced along the hall, a word or two was exchanged with some one outside the parlor door, and Royal faced around in time to see his wife enter the room.

Could that be Phyllis? He had never pictured her thus, and could scarcely credit his eyes or believe that they reported a living verity. Slender, radiant, clad still in black from crown to instep, but worn, somehow, differently from his recollection of it, with clear gray eyes alight with pleasure, soft rings of hair clustering about a white forehead and cheeks aglow with health and exercise, she seemed to Royal a totally new creature.

She advanced at once with outstretched hand and manner totally devoid of embarrassment. It was all very different from that which he had expected, but by the time he had taken her hand in his Royal had become conscious that whatever she might decide in regard to their future relations there would be no danger of petty misunderstanding or narrow judgment with this woman. He lifted his head and squared his shoulders as though a load had been removed from them.

"When did you come?" she was saying; "this morning? And you came at once to us. That was charming of you. I only wish Nina had been at home to receive and help to welcome you."

Royal, who for the last second had been perilously near taking her into his arms, recovered himself sufficiently to take the chair she indicated. It was not only that the situation was unexpected, but that she, as she now appeared, was equally unexpected. He sat regarding her helplessly.

"You received my letter?" His tone was experimental.

Phyllis did not answer him directly. She had laid a pair of blue spectacles on the table, and was busily removing her glove.

"I have to wear glasses still out of doors," she informed him cheerfully. "But in the house I am quite independent of them."

Royal's eyes were on her hands. She had taken off the right glove and was unbuttoning the left. The trimming of her sleeve had caught in a button and was giving her trouble.

"Let me help you," Royal said, and leaned eagerly forward.

She surrendered her hand at once, and he extricated the fastening from its entanglement, and then, in response to an acquiescent glance, drew off the glove. As he did so his eyes instinctively sought her third finger, and he drew his breath hard—she had taken off her wedding ring. His hopes fell below freezing point in an instant. To him it appeared a portent.

"Why did you take it off?"

The words broke from him involuntarily and with a thrill of pain.

"Because it was John's, and I am not his wife."

Then when he would have spoken she checked him by a gesture and turned her truthful eyes full on him:

"Your letter came some days ago, Dr. Royal. I know why you did not write before—that consideration for me held you back from telling me the story months ago. You would not imperil my chance of sight. I am grateful for your kindness. But I could not discuss the matter with you until you should have spoken of it yourself. I wanted to talk with you about it, so I showed you that you might speak at last."

Royal looked bewildered.

"You knew of the affair before my letter reached you?" he hazarded.

"Yes. I've known the story for months past, Dr. Royal—ever since a week or two after you went away last December. When I saw you that last morning you seemed so unlike John that I could scarcely realize how you could have changed so much. I said nothing to Nina at first and put the thought aside, but it kept returning. When I spoke to her about it first she made fun of me, laughed at the idea of your being changed, more than the years would account for, and thought I couldn't see that she was evading and slipping away from the subject. When my eyes got stronger I got out the package of photographs of himself my cousin had sent me from time to time, and only the first of which I had ever seen. None of them was in the least like you, and no stretch of imagination would make them so. You seemed a totally different man. Then I remembered blunders that you had made, and which I did not notice at the time—blunders John couldn't have made. It troubled me, for it was all incomprehensible."

She paused a moment, and Royal in a dim way realized that it had been hard on her. His conscience smote him.

"One day," Phyllis went on, "Nina left a letter of yours on the table when she had finished reading it aloud. She did not usually leave them around. I slipped the bandage up and looked at the handwriting. It was not a bit like John's. He wrote a delicate, student's hand, almost like a woman's, and you use a stub and write with large letters and a heavy stroke. I couldn't endure it any longer then and made Nina tell me."

"Was that the reason you would not let me come in the spring?" Royal questioned, a light breaking in on him.

"Yes. I wanted to get used to it all, and to learn to separate you from John in my mind. And I wanted to be my very self when we should meet again, besides—not helpless and dependent any more, but a woman who could take her life into her own hands if need were. Do you understand?"

Royal bent his head. His brain was in a whirl, but it held fast to one joyful fact; she had known the whole story when she had written that note. His heart leaped, but he held himself in check.

"When I learned that John was dead it seemed at first as though half my life had been broken off and buried with him," the soft voice proceeded. "And I dared not weep for him, even when my heart was aching. That was hard, for there was never a time in my life without the thought of John. It seems strange that he should have continued to care for me so much through all those years—that he should have shortened his life through trying to provide for me. It makes me feel so guilty, so selfish, that after my sight began to fail I should have been more taken up with my own hopes and fears than with thoughts of him—that I never should have loved him as he deserved to be loved." The voice was wistful and very tender, but the sweet gray eyes were tearless.

Royal rose and came to her, unable any longer to master his emotions. Bending down he took her hands and raised her to her feet:

"You knew it all when you wrote that note—knew that you were not, and never had been, John Royal's wife, but were mine? And you asked me to come to you! Phyllis, do you know what you are doing? Do you know that you are giving me hope of more than forgiveness?"

Her sweet eyes met his in all simplicity, and her hands were not withdrawn from his clasp. She was without the catlike impulse which leads women to play with men in moments of strong emotion. And in her unworldliness, her lack of self consciousness, it seemed to her that so far from having aught to forgive, no woman had been so loved, so honored.

"You have done so much—suffered so much—for me, both you and John. It hardly seems credible that men should so sacrifice themselves to the helplessness of a woman. But"—with a proud uplifting of her head—"you must not let me hamper your life—must not feel obliged to hold to the marriage. Nina told me what you said. I am so grateful to you that to have you feel yourself bound in any way"— She faltered and broke down, for his eyes were on her eyes, and she could not fail to read their meaning.

"My own—my own, at last!" he murmured, bending his face and seeking her lips with his lips. "Do you think I will let you go?—that I can let you go? Never, until death shall part us, my love! my wife!"

And for a space there was silence.

* * * * * * *

After a while, when they had talked the affair over from beginning to end, and canvassed it exhaustively, Phyllis, twisting and turning around her finger a diamond ring new to the place, said in a low voice:

"That marriage with you was legal, I know, and would stand in court, and all that; but, Dr. Royal, you were not in my thoughts during the ceremony, nor afterward, as yourself. I thought of John. Perhaps it is a woman's fancy, but I wish"— She hesitated.

"You wish what?" Royal questioned, possessing himself of her hand, and merging rapidly into that state of mind in which anything short of half his kingdom appears to a man too paltry to offer the woman of his love.

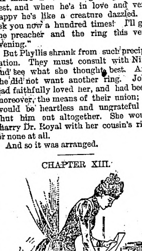
"To marry you, and think of you while I'm doing it." She smiled, and then the blood mounted to her forehead; she turned from him petulantly: "Why did you make me say it? You should have asked me yourself."

"Forgive me, my darling; I should indeed," Royal admitted penitently. "A man's a blundering simpleton at best, and when he's in love and very happy he's like a creature dazzled. I ask you now a hundred times! I'll get the preacher and the ring this very evening."

But Phyllis shrank from such precipitation. They must consult with Nina and see what she thought best. And she did not want another ring. John had faithfully loved her, and had been, moreover, the means of their union; it would be heartless and ungrateful to shut him out altogether. She would marry Dr. Royal with her cousin's ring or none at all.

And so it was arranged.

CHAPTER XIII.



This she opened and took from it a thick envelope.

"Miss Phyllis, Dr. Royal say how you mus' git ready right quick, kase he gone arter a buggy fur to drive you out to Arlin'ton dis arternoon."

The maid stood with the door knob in her hand, and smiled with the joyousness peculiar to the colored countenance. She addressed Mrs. Royal familiarly by her Christian name, as is still the habit with southern domestics, and her gaze rested upon the young lady with approval.

"Lord! Miss Phyllis, dat cert'n'y is one pretty dress you got on! Arter you git done wid it you mus' save it for me, please 'm."

Phyllis laughed and promised. She was used—as what southern woman is not?—to having her clothes bespoken before the dressmaker's folds were out of them. She glanced down at the admired garment. It was a tea gown of soft India silk, white, with a tiny black figure, in deference to her mourning; the collar and cuffs were also black, and the puff of silk in front was caught against her waist with a knot of black and white ribbons. A pretty gown, indeed, and it set off the charms of the wearer. Phyllis smoothed it with her hand and touched the ribbons caressingly. And why not?—had not her husband praised the dress, and in it found her fair, and told her so with kisses?

The remarriage had taken place a fortnight before very privately at the house of a clergyman over in the district. No one had been present save Mrs. Hart, and there had been no public mention of the affair. None was necessary, for the first marriage filled all legal requirements, and the second had taken place simply to gratify Phyllis.

After the ceremony the pair had gone away together for a little wedding journey, agreeing to return to Alexandria in a couple of weeks to join Mrs. Hart, when all three would proceed to Virginia for the meeting with the executors. Phyllis also wished to remain a few days in Matoacca, in order to superintend the erection of a monument to her cousin.

As she made her preparations for the drive Phyllis hummed to herself in a tender undertone, the happiness within her finding vent in music as naturally as does that of nature's woodland children, for the girl was almost as much a product of field and forest as are mocking birds and thrushes.

Her bonnet was on and her fingers busy with the strings when she suddenly ceased from motion and gazed deep into the eyes which regarded her from the mirror. How clear they looked, how sentient and strong! A wave of thankfulness swept over her, and she murmured reverently, "And for the sight of our eyes, O Lord, accept ye praise!"

Then her husband's voice from the hall called up to her to hasten, and she caught up handkerchief and gloves. At the chamber door, however, she bethought herself and turned back to a desk on a small table near the bed, wherein were John Royal's letters, his photographs, and her most treasured souvenirs of her aunt. This she opened and took from it a thick envelope, which she slipped in her pocket as she sped down stairs.

"I forgot something and had to go back," she explained, as she joined her husband and Mrs. Hart, the latter having come out to the door step to see them off.

"Did you make a cross in the path?" the lady questioned, gayly.

"Poor, dear old mammy! What a point she always made about 'backin' de luck with a cross mark! No; I forgot it. I'll do it now!" And she daintily traced a cross on the doorstep with the toe of her little boot.

"Come along, you superstitious young woman," called Royal from the pavement. "I've turned back scores of times after starting and nothing ever happened to me."

"Fortune's favorite!—just hear, till him!" quoted Mrs. Hart mockingly, as they drove away.

The pleasant country road led away from the city six or seven miles to the ancient home of the Lees. The air was balmy, yet bracing with autumnal vigor and a suggestion of the frost to come; the road was fairly good, for a Virginia road, and the pair chatted gayly as they bowled along. Phyllis enjoyed it all with the zest of a child, and seemed never weary of the delight of the eyes. The tangles of vines on the roadside, the mosses and ferns around the springs they passed, the festoons of wild grape vine pendent from the trees and rich with the shadings of dark fruit and yellow foliage, the marvelous blending of crimson, gold, green and tawny bronze showed by the leaves, even the waving broom sedge and stiff little firs, like Dutch toys, dotting the worn out fields, all appeared to her beautiful.

Presently they ascended a long, steep hill and drove along its crest a hundred yards, and Royal turned the buggy and called on his wife to behold the world and the wonder thereof. And Phyllis, after a rapturous cry, uttered low down in her throat, like the note of a wood pigeon, folded her hands together and was speechless, spellbound at the loveliness of the scene before her.

Washington, with its countless beauties of architecture, its monuments, steeples, roof trees and dominating dome—Washington in slumberous autumnal graciousness was spread before them, strangely beautified by distance and backed by the tender purplish blue of the far horizon. Nearer—almost at the foot of the hill—rolled the gleaming waters of the Potomac, "all quiet along" its banks now, for many a year quiet, restful and infinitely beautiful—thunder of cannon and rattle of musketry, sounds of battle and bivouac, hushed forever, and the river flowing tranquilly, taking its share in the labor of the present, with hardly a suggestion left of its participation in the sorrow and wrong doing of the past.

Away in the distance the stream seemed fettered by the links of an iron bridge, over which, as they gazed, a train passed slowly, overshadowed by a canopy of bluish gray smoke. To the left, bathed in afternoon sunlight, sleepy old Alexandria, steeped to the eaves in the joy of calm, showed picturesquely against the background of the Virginia hills, and over the heights of Georgetown the shadow of a cloud passed dreamily.

Then they drove on, talking of things that had been in the nation's history; but as they neared the gateway of Arlington silence fell again. It was disrupted in a moment, and all sentiment and solemnity dispelled by a party of little negroes who swarmed out from the archway, like flies, tumbling, grinning, and dancing around the buggy with shouts of "Please, sar, gimme penny! please, ma'am, gimme penny! Look at me, lady! Dis a-way! I ain't no daid folks! I kin stan' on my haid fur penny, I kin!"

Royal menaced the laughing cohort with his whip, but his face was too good humored for his gesture to make much impression, and the hilarious scraps of ebony held their ground until Phyllis had distributed among them all the small change in their possession.

"It spoils the solemnity of the approach," she admitted when Royal smilingly suggested that they might be encouraging a nuisance. "But they looked so jolly I couldn't help giving them something. I haven't seen a lot of little negroes jumping about for years. It does my eyes good."

Inside the gates there was no lack of solemnity, and Royal pulled his horse up to a walk and slowly followed the road winding under magnificent trees, through stretches of velvety verdure, past plots of exquisite blooming plants, rockeries, and tall vases filled with flowers, vines and ferns, untouched as yet by frost. Now they caught glimpses of shady dingles and clear streams rippling purely, and again of level meadows, suggestive of old homesteads, lowing kine, milkmaids—anything, everything, except a graveyard.

Gradually the road ascended, and a thrill passed through Phyllis' sensitive nerves as her eyes rested for the first time on the home of the south's great chieftain. She wished to go there at once, but Royal turned aside to the cemetery which surrounds the home of Lee. There it lay, stretching almost as far as eye could reach, line on line, in close, compact ranks; in companies, in regiments, in battalions—so many! so many! There seemed miles on miles of them, the tiny, plain, pitiful white stones, neat, precise and infinitely pathetic; sole mementoes of thousands of gallant hearts that struggled and bled and broke for a politicians' quarrel.

Later, as they sat on the portico, with the spell of the place upon them, and watched the flow of the river, the passing of craft of various kinds, and the lazy flapping of the great flag against its staff, Phyllis began talking of her old home beyond the mountains and of the woman who had reared her.

"She was very good to me always," the girl said. "But after my sight began to fail she was tenderness itself—eyes to the blind and strength and courage to the weary and hopeless. No one but myself can realize her goodness. She was an imperious woman, and liked her own way, and people often misunderstood her. Poor Aunt Anne!"

Royal made no comment, being far too happy to cherish resentment against the living or the dead. As for that inconsequent will, he was more than reconciled to it; he actually blessed the testatory vagaries which had opened the way to his happiness. Still, he could not but wonder over it as he hearkened to his wife's encomiums.

"Next to me, her heart was set on John," Phyllis proceeded. "It wasn't only that he was her nephew, and good and clever—that was a source of pride, of course—but I think her love went out to him specially because of his bearing her lover's name. She used to fancy she saw a resemblance between my cousin and John Hart. It was beautiful, the way Aunt Anne clung to the old romance."

"Very beautiful," Royal assented; his eyes were on a steam tug fussing in the stream below, and he was only half attending.

"Doesn't it seem strange that I should have married John Hart's nephew instead of Aunt Anne's? And bearing his name, too. Just like a fairy story. Aunt Anne would have liked it. I am sure. She wanted to knit her past to my future, poor dear, and she has done so by ways she never dreamed of. I wish she were here to see!"

Royal could not find it in his heart to echo the wish. The return of a spirit from the beyond, even on an amicable errand, seemed to him subversive of order. He kept his reflection to himself, however.

"Here is more fairy story," Phyllis laughed, and took from her pocket the envelope there hidden. "You are going to have to cast ashes on your head and abuse yourself generally. You have been judging Aunt Anne—yes, you have, all of you!—the people at home and Nina and everybody—saying that she did not love me, nor care what should become of me if her plan for marrying me to John should fall through, and all sorts of horrid things. All because of that ridiculous will she made so long ago. Of course she wanted us to have the property! She had quarreled with our parents about it, and this would be a way to square the matter without sacrifice of her own pride. And then she liked the property itself, and wanted to keep it together."

Royal laughed.

"My dear wife, don't excite yourself or go into a fury of defense. I'm not complaining. That will, to me, is most satisfactory. It's given me the desire of my heart, and will eventually put a penny or two in my pocket besides. You forget that I'm a residuary legatee in the second degree."

"You'll not get a penny piece!" laughed Phyllis—"neither you nor any of the rest of the clan; so don't count your chickens before they are hatched."

She thrust the envelope into his hand.

"What's this?" demanded Royal.

"Read for yourself," she gleefully answered, "and prepare to make obeisance unto me. I am a very important personage."

Royal drew the paper from its envelope and slowly unfolded it. As he caught its import he gave vent to a whistle of astonishment. It bore date of a few months previous to Miss Royal's death, and was very concise and simple. It was a codicil to the former will, and provided that in event of the death of her nephew John Hart Royal previous to his marriage with his cousin Phyllis Royal the property should pass to the girl entire, and further provided that, should Phyllis' blindness continue, the property, duly placed in the hands of trustees, should be charged with her maintenance during the term of her natural life; after which it was to be distributed according to the terms of the original will.

Royal drew a long breath as he put the paper back into its envelope.

"How long have you had this?"

"Since before Aunt Anne died. She gave it to me one day and told me to keep it in my desk until after my wedding day. If anything unforeseen should happen, I was to give it to Mr. Brandon or Nina."

Royal pondered.

"I wonder what could have suggested the idea that John Royal might die?" he observed thoughtfully.

"Aunt Anne was very nervous for more than a year before her death," Phyllis explained. "That paper was drawn up the spring we were here first about my eyes. There had been a terrible epidemic in Vienna, where John was—a sort of plague; the papers were full of it, and John, being a physician, was of course all the time exposed to the infection. Aunt Anne was terribly uneasy about him."

"And you have known the contents of this paper—how long?"

"Ever since Nina told me of John's death. I never thought of it at all before. There was no reason why I should. Nina and I opened it then, but I wouldn't let her say anything about it to you, nor would I tell you myself. This question of money had been so large, so disastrous a factor in the plans for my marriage to John, that I wanted our decision to be uninfluenced by it in any way. Of course I'm glad about it—more than glad. It proves to the world that which I knew so well, that Aunt Anne really cared about my future. And"—her face softened and broke into shy smiles as she slipped her hand into his—"I am glad to bring something more than just myself to the man who sacrificed himself for me."

And so it came to pass that there was a suit after all, and the lawyers had a hand in the matter. Not that it amounted to much, being only the necessary legal incantation without which no property in the commonwealth may change hands. The only point to be established was the time of John Royal's death, and this the evidence of the young physician and the colored nurse sufficed to do. The negro deposed to having stopped the dead man's watch at ten minutes to 12—"soon as bref had done lef' him good." There might have been room for argument here, as the marriage was over at precisely that time; but the young doctor declared that when he, not caring to bear the whole responsibility, had left the room in search of the hotel proprietor, it had been a good half hour earlier, and the patient was then in articulo mortis.

The little story went abroad and caused much local interest. Phyllis was feted and made much of among her old friends and neighbors, and treated as though she were a very extraordinary young woman indeed. And no wonder; for in this prosaic age it is but seldom that a woman can lay claim to the honor of having inspired knightly devoir.

THE END.

Coal Product of Four Western States.

A recent census bulletin gives statistics of the coal product of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana and Michigan. Illinois shows the greatest increase in production over the tenth census, namely, 5,988,835 short tons. Ohio has increased her product 3,033,103 tons and Indiana 1,339,730 tons. The increase in the value of product is as follows: Illinois, $3,975,371; Ohio, $1,635,733; Indiana, $737,594. The coal area in Illinois is reported as 37,000 square miles, in Ohio 10,000 square miles, in Indiana 7,000 square miles and in Michigan 7,000 square miles. The coal from these states is bituminous, and is adapted for steam and heating purposes. The number of employes engaged in the industry in Illinois is reported as 21,323, receiving in wages $8,694,347. The grand total of expenditure was $10,336,069. Ohio gave employment to 19,501 persons, who were paid $6,882,654 in wages. The total expenditures of all kinds in the production of coal were $8,232,183. Indiana, with her total number of 6,532 employes, paid $2,201,044 for wages, the grand total of expenditures of all kinds being $2,581,630.

The product of Michigan coal in 1889 was 67,431 tons, valued at $115,011. Compared with the tenth census report, these figures show a decrease in production of 33,369 tons and in value of $109,489. The total amount expended for wages, including office force, as reported for the eleventh census, was $93,594, the grand total of all expenditures being $113,714. There has been a gradual decrease in production in this state since 1882. The product of the mines of Pennsylvania and Ohio is delivered within the state at prices with which local operators find difficulty in competing.

New Zealand's Frozen Meat Trade.

According to recent statistics there has been an enormous development of the frozen meat trade between New Zealand and England. In 1882 the number of frozen sheep exported to England was only 8,839. In 1890 the number had risen to 1,562,647. Curiously enough, the frozen meat trade in Australia has not expanded in anything like the same degree as in New Zealand, but a Sydney journal anticipates that "what with the steady reduction in the cost of freezing and freights, the spread of the taste for frozen mutton at home, an the inevitable increase of our flocks an herds, we have good reason to see in the food requirements of England and Europ an almost untouched and inexhaustibl mine of wealth for Australia."

A battle with a midnight cracksman [illegible] not be other than a desperate affair, provided the householder and the maraude both possess "sand." A burglar visited th residence of Major J. C. Wall at Kimball Tenn., a few days ago. While trying t effect an entrance through the window o a room occupied by J. C. Wall, Jr., who i nineteen years of age, the thief was detected and fired upon. Young Wall opene his door and ran out into the hall, throug which the rascal was trying to make hi escape, and headed him off. A terribl struggle in the dark then took place. Th thief would not surrender, and, when Wal told him he would shoot again, said: "Yo have already killed me," and pulling hi revolver shot young Wall through the le shoulder. Wall says he placed his pist against the burglar's breast and fired agai The man fell from the porch, but got u and made a hasty retreat into the darkne and rain. Wall's injuries are serious, bu not dangerous. He is positive he hit th man three times, but does not know whet er he was a white man or a negro.

Face to Face with a Wild Beast.

The unexpected is generally startlin and it was particularly so in the case Mr. Kratz. While prospecting near Lu lake, Ga., the other day he ran across large wild animal crouched in a lau thicket on Rock creek. He was great startled, and wholly unprepared for t emergency. Happily he chanced to reme ber that he had promised to be home b o'clock, so he hastily retraced his st down the mountain and took a short through muddy fields, thorn thickets a briar patches. The animal seen by M Kratz was a Mexican lion, which escap from Barnum's show last summer.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

Joseph Smith returned Tuesday morning.

N. Holberg was at Grand Forks yesterday.

John Kops was over from Grand Forks yesterday.

Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Wishard drove to Fosston to-day.

Country roads are not, at present, in the best condition.

Rev. Fr. Arpin held services at St. Mary's church Sunday.

The Meehan drive will probably arrive here within a week.

Mrs. M. Bray and Edmund drove to Crookston yesterday.

Dr. John Watson is in Minneapolis. Expects to be back Saturday.

Another big Walker drive has been coming down the Clearwater this week.

Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Stiles left Saturday evening, after a very pleasant visit among old friends.

Wm. Ralph made another trip to Beltrami county this week, to locate several land hunters.

Fred Lowe's 21st birthday was celebrated last Thursday. We understand it was a success.

Mr. Grover, father of Joseph Grover, is very low, and fears are entertained for his recovery.

We thank the lady of Gentilly for the news items this week, and hope she will continue them.

Lost, a gold child's pin near Main st between 1st and Flack's. Finder please return to this office.

Sunday Edmund Bray had the weather clerk on his side, so the drive to Louisville was much more pleasant.

Jim Mead went to Winnipeg Junction last night returning this morning with a team for Joseph Smith & Co

Miss Katie McNerthney returned Monday from Terrebonne, having closed her engagement in the school there.

Ray Meehan arrived from Milwaukee Saturday morning and has gone to work book keeping for P. & J. Meehan.

S. J. Sprague reports several good sales this week. All our local land agents seem to be doing big business.

Miss Sue Lowe, of Crookston, a sister of Mrs. Geo Ralph, visited here last week, returning to Crookston Saturday morning.

The excavation of the basement for the new schoolhouse is completed. Blair & Co. made short work of this job and will now proceed on the foundation work.

Miss Sophia Schusser visited Miss Frances Koke at Euclid several days last week. Both returned Saturday morning. Miss Koke having completed her term of school there.

Joseph Smith was at West Superior during his absence. Says the Red Lake Falls people there with but few exceptions are thinking about returning as soon as possible.

Mr. and Mrs. Rubertus and daughter, of Washington, D. C., arrived Friday morning on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Theo. Garceau. Mrs. Garceau is a niece of Mr. and Mrs. Rubertus.

The candidates at the school election received the following vote: Ed Garceau, 161; Fred Krueger, 145; H. B. Davis, 141; Theo. Garceau, 111; John Rodgers, 108; H. M. Kaus, 105.

The fall bicycle season will soon be at hand. Phil Kaufer can furnish any one with any make of bicycle at reasonable figures. If interested, it may profit you to get his figures on wheels.

J. D. Marshall has purchased the residence of Dr. John Watson and is proceeding to arrange things preparatory to taking up his residence in it. He is having a large cistern built.

W. T. Spillane has the cellar dug for a new residence on 3d st opposite the Northwestern. Mr. Spillane will build a neat and comfortable home that will be an ornament to his part of town.

The village is for the first time making use of the New Era grader. Third street has been much improved through its application, while Main st and several cross roads will be equally benefited.

The Catholics of Lambert are in a flourishing condition financially. They are erecting a large new church the dimensions of which will be 50x100 feet, which they intend to complete this fall. A church of that size, nicely finished inside and out, will indeed be a great improvement to that locality.

H. O. Fanning, the pleasant representative of the Maxwell Lumber company, came down from Red Lake yesterday by way of Fosston. He returned to Red Lake and will continue his investigations. Mr. Fanning does not seem to think the lumber will be manufactured any further up the stream than Red Lake Falls.

Jas Brady returned home Tuesday, after a two years absence.

E. Marchildon and Miss Hadyn were married by Rev Fr. Arpin yesterday.

Cyprien Gassolin says the water running down Bottineau avenue turns into his basement and is ruining it. The street committee might look into the matter and if there is a remedy, apply it.

J. Patnode could'nt get any of the logs started over the dam yesterday, so he went over him self as a sort of inducement. He must have liked the experiment, as he repeated it a few hours after to the amusement of the crowd.

When anyone tells an editor "It takes me just two minutes to read your paper," what do you suppose the editor thinks? He thinks "What a blessed fool you are to subscribe for a paper that gives you but two minutes comfort a week!"

A special election will soon be called by the county commissioners of Polk county to vote on the question of bonding the county in the sum of $320,000 to aid the Duluth & Winnipeg in the construction of their line into Crookston.

B. Sivigney and August Herard went to St. Paul last night to contract for the lumber to build the new school house. They have secured $20,000 bonds, have secured a cash advance on them and will thus be enabled to proceed at once with the contsruction.

Otto Kankle was in town again this week and called on us this time. Otto says they are prospering at Fertile. Two new churches are being built this summer and several fine residences. His old partner X. Sohler, who is now in Germany receiving treatment, is homesick for this country and will soon be back.

W. A. Schreiter appeared before the council at its last session and presented his claim for land on Third street. The council refused to take action in the matter. It is reported Mr. Schreiter will either fence his land or plow it. There will undoubtedly be legislation before the street becomes public property.

A six year old son of John Bartlett was trying to milk George Ralph's cow at Crookston Friday evening. The cow kicked him, breaking his leg. A number of small boys had been playing where the cow was feeding and the others had induced this boy to make the attempt with the above result. George's cow evidently knows to whom she belongs.

Among the many mechanical novelties promised for this season's Minneapolis Exposition, are a number that will be entirely new to people of the Northwest. Among the most prominent of these are an envelope machine that cuts out the paper, gums the flaps and folds them together, in fact, does everything except address them. Another feature that will prove attractive is a wood carving machine that draws and cuts out the most wonderfully intricate disigns. Still another attractive specialty is a machine for weaving wire mattresses. There are numerous other features of the same kind.

Arthur Sturtzkoph, a traveling salesman for the firm of Vouwie Bros, of Chicago, has been around this part of the country the past week. The Fisher Bulletin says, Mr. S. is a gentleman of some note, being a Russian count, and at one time a millionare, but unfortunately for him, while in Russia he imbibed ideas contrary to those entertained by the government and was sentenced to Siberia for life. When near that dreaded country he escaped from his guard, and after terrible hardships managed to reach this country. He is a wonderful linguist and has adopted the life of a traveling salesman in the hope that it will restore his shattered health.

The East Grand Forks News says: The opening of the militia encampment was darkened with sadness by the terrible accident at Osnabrock by which young guardsman Michael Langan lost his life before the very eyes of his wife and baby who were on the platform to bid him goodbye. Langan was a member of the Langdon guards and came down to Osnabrock with them; but instead of waiting until the train had stopped he anticipated and sprang off, intending to caress his darling child, which with its mother awaited him. He fell under the car and the wheels passed over his head, crushing his skull. The terrible accident was witnessed by friends and neighbors without power to aid and a scene of sorrow followed which rent the hearts of all his comrades and neighbors

There is in every town a narrow minded lubatic who is desirous of seeing a newspaper run on a starvation basis. The poorer looking the sheet the more it is admired by him. He loves to see a paper sent abroad that is a disgrace to a town typographically, locally and editorially. It is seldom a newspaper asks for more than its just dues—but the pinched brained, ginger-bread, punken-pie economist to whom we refer—this generality of every community is not willing to allow even justice to the best advertising medium a city can send abroad. What a blessing such a man is to a community! Watch his course and how he aids in the advancement of the general welfare of the city. Note the improvements he makes. If you have time enough to attend to other people's business, solve the problem—why was he created?

La Grippe

During the epidemic of La Grippe last season Dr. Kings New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds, proved to be the best remedy. Reports from the many who use it confirm this statement, they were not only quickly relieved, but the disease left no bad after rezults. We ask you to give this remedy a trial and we guarantee that you will be satisfied with results, or the purchase price will be refunded. It has no equal in La Grippe, or any Throat, Chest or Lung Trouble. Trial bettle free at W. A. Schreiter's Drug Store Large bottle 50c. and $100

When the Earth Was Young

Says Dr. Ball, astronomer royal for Ireland, it went around so fast that the day was only three hours long. The earth was liquid then, and it spun around and around at that tearful speed, and as the sun causes every increasing tides upon its surface, it at last burst in two. The smaller part became the moon, which has been going round the earth ever since at an increasing distance. The demand for speed is one which no invention of man seems to satisfy. Ocean steamers now cross the Atlantic in a week, but the public clamors for a shorter voyage, and and some of the companies are holding out a hope of three days. Perhaps the speed indicate above, when our old globe whirled around at the rate of 8,000 miles an hour, would satisfy the people who travel, but as the world is getting on in years now, and is a little slew, they will have to be contented with such a gait as the railroads can strike. When they want speed combined with smooth running and safety, those who are posted select "The Burlington," the favorite low grade, smooth track line from Minneapolis and St. Paul to Chicag and St. Louis. A SCIENTIFIC authority who has made careful and elaborate investigation estimates that the average laboring man wears out five ounces of muscle a day. Now let him turn his attention to the walking delegate.

SAID a woman of the world, as she watched a party of men smoking and drinking: "If a man has any taste or delicacy in his composition he will manifest it by the way in which he handles his cigar and his glass of wine. I have never known this test to fail."

QUEEN VICTORIA still clings to the black dress which is the symbol of her widowhood. Indeed, black was always her favorite even when she was young and unmarried, it being an expressed opinion that she "looked best in black."

WHEN Edison gets his kinetograph into good working order it will not be necessary to go out to the lakes for a change of scene in the summer. All the addition needed will be a pneumatic arrangement to blow in a little of the fresh air off the waters as the other apparatus shows up the panorama of things there.

JACK H. BENNER, a Scotch dog belonging to Henry Benner, of Macon, has been all along noted for his prowess at rat killing, but he surpassed all former records recently. He killed just twenty-one rats within fifteen minutes, and fainted away as soon as he had disposed of the last one. The rats were monster ones, some being almost as large as an ordinary squirrel

A CHICAGO man claims to have invented a gas generator by which he will be able to compete with the natural gas of Pennsylvania on its own ground. Remembering the great promises and small performances of Mr. Pennington, of air ship fame, the outside public is no longer swallowing gaseous Chicago schemes with its old time avidity.

IN discussing the new theory of the sun's heat before the Boston Scientific Society George Smith showed why the fat man should suffer more than the lean one. As gravity depends upon the mass of a body, and as heat is, according to Mr. Smith's theory, in one sense gravity, it follows that the larger a body is the hotter. Hence the fat man's discomfort.

MADEMBA, king of Segon, Africa, who was elevated to his present position by Colonel Archinard, was formerly in the French telegraph service in Africa. Mademba is a native of the country over which he at present rules, but was formerly controller of telegraphs at Senegal. Before accepting his regal state he made it a condition that his name should continue to be inscribed on the list of telegraph servitors, and that his situation of king should be considered as subservient to that of his original employment.

THE most important improvements in practical medicine in the United States of late years have been in surgery in its various branches. This country has led the way in the ligation of some of the larger articles, in the removal of abdominal tumors, treatment of diseases and injuries peculiar to women and of spinal affections, as well as deformities of various kinds. Above all, we were the first to show the use of anæsthetics—the most important advance made during the century.

IT is believed in Philadelphia that the only one of the original continental flags in existence is in the possession of the City Troop of that city. The old flag is spread between two large pieces of plate glass which keep the air away from it. The probabilities are that were it removed from this case it would fall to pieces. In design it is somewhat similar to the English jack. The design was made by a committee, of which Benjamin Franklin was a member, in 1776. A few years later the first American standard accepted by Congress was submitted and adopted.

ACCOUNTS from Sierra Leone represen tthat the suppression of the slave trade along that coast and the consequent inability of the warlike races to sell their captives has caused a revival of former scenes of slaughter and bloodshed. Coomassie, it is said, has again witnessed the killing of as many as 300 victims in one day. The average Wangarus recently made a raid into Dagomba, completely devastating the villages, and carrying off over 2,000 captives. They were unable to get rid of the prisoners as slaves and held a sacrificial feast which lasted for three days, in which every capitive perished, not even children being spared.

WASHINGTON.

MESSRS. A. J. DREXEL, William Singerly, A. K. McClure and J. H. Windrill have consented to serve on the commission to select a site for the Philadelphia mint.

JUDGE CROUNSE, of Nebraska, who succeeded Gen. Batcheller, of New York, as assistant secretary of the treasury, will receive no pay for his services unless the senate confirms his appointment.

THE chief of the bureau of statistics reports that the total value of the exports of beef and hog products from the United States during the month of June was $6,944,783.

BIDS were opened at the ordinance bureau of the war department for the construction of 25 8-inch, 50 10-inch and 25 12-inch breech loading rifles for seaport defense.

FIRST COMPTROLLER MATTHEWS made a ruling that the judges and other officers the land court organized June 15th under the provisions of an act approved March 3, 1891, can receive no compensation for their services until they shall have been confirmed by the senate.

THE chief of the bureau of statistics reports that the total values of the exports of domestic mineral oils from the United States during the month of June, 1891, and during the 12 months ended June 30, 1891, as compared with similar exports during the corresponding periods of the preceding year were as follows: June, 1891, $4,039,524; 1890, $4,122,86. Twelve months ended June 30, 1891, $51,313,454; 1890, $50,854,522.

THE committee, Messrs. Daskam, Milliken and Huntington, counting the money in the treasury, on the transfer of the office of United States treasurer from Mr. Houston to Mr. Nebeker, has completed its work. The total amount of money counted was $614,511,592.32, of which $175,950,000 was gold and silver coin, the rest being paper money. The money was found correct to a cent. The count has been in progress two months and most of that time 60 people have been employed in the work.

THE physicians in attendance upon Rev. Charles H. Spurgeon announces that he has a chance of recovering from the severe illness from which he has been suffering for some time past.

FRED DOUGLASE denies that he left his post at Port Au Prince because the Haytian government did not care to recognize a representative of the United States and desired to break off all intercourse with this country.

MR. GLADSTONE writes to a friend that he has not, nor has he had at any time, the remotest intention of giving up the leadership of his party, but on the contrary, he intends to take a very vigorous personal part in the next struggle for party supremacy in the house of commons.

UNFORTUNATE EVENTS.

CROPS are badly damaged by a storm in South Dakota.

AT Rochester, N. Y., a gas tank of the Municipal gas company, 40 feet high and holding 300,000 cubic feet of gas, exploded, causing two deaths.

HEAVY rains wash out railroad tracks in North Dakota and Montana and delay trains. A passenger train runs into a landslide in Montana and two men are killed.

AN explosion on the steamer Booth, from Hamberg, while lying at a dock in New York, killed two men, bruised three others and damaged the vessel $50,000.

Two men and a negro boy were drowned near San Miguel Islands while hunting seals. Another man clung to a rock 24 hours and was saved.

ROBERT H. DAVIS, aged 55, night watchman at the Rockland paper mill, Wilmington, Del., fell into the cogs of a revolving wheel and was literally ground to pieces.

AT Reeves & Co.'s stacker manufactory, at Columbus, Ind., four men were on an elevator in the third story, where it had caught. When loosened it fell forty feet. James Bronson was instantly killed and the three other men fatally injured.

WITHIN a radius of three miles in Hereford township, Pa., a dozen buildings including dwellings, barns, mills, etc., have been burned during the past few weeks. The loss will aggregate over $50,000. Officers are being specially employed to run down the firebugs.

Two double drownings occurred among Chicago picnickers. Within sight of hundreds of merrymakers at Columbia park, John McNeff, who was rowing with Miss Lucy Kaser, capsized the boat by leaning too far after an oar and both drowned. At Lake Calumet Leslie Roung and Henry Campbell were drowned.

How the Sailors Got Their Medicine.

Curious yarns are spun about the method of dispensing medicines followed by divers captains at sea. Each bottle of the medicine chest bears a distinguishing number. An illiterate shipmaster, having consulted his book of medical instructions, found that a strong dose from No. 6 bottle was the proper remedy for a sick sailor standing before him. No. 6, however, had been in great request during the passage, and not a drop remained.

For a moment the amateur doctor was at a loss. An inspiration opportunely caused his corrugated brow to smoothen. He mixed together portions from bottles No. 2 and No. 4, on the arithmetical principle that two and four make six! Deponent sayeth not what effect, if any, the dreadful decoction had upon the seaman.

Another story tells equally against the service. It is related that a lieutenant, in command of one of Her Majesty's gunboats, deemed the responsibility of the change of a medicine chest too much for him. Immediately she was off soundings, the gallant officer mustered all hands, and divided the contents of the chest equally among the crew.

How Arizona Was Named,

Here is the true way by which the Territory of Arizona was named: During the time that Hernan Cortez traveled through this country, over 300 years ago, there lived a tribe of Indians in the country around Casa Grande, near Florence that were named by Cortez himself, "Los Narizones," or the "Big Noses." The women were called "Las Narizonas." Now the query is: Did that Territoty derive its name from that tribe of indians, now extinct? The supposition is that it did. The country was named by Cortez "El Paris de las Narizonas," preferring, through politeness the feminine to the masculine. After the years the Mexicans dropped all that preceded the word "Narizonas," and in speaking of this country, then almost a terra incognita, they would say, "en Narizonas." In the course of time they eliminated the "N" at the beginning and the, "s" at the end of of the word, and it became Arizona, as we now have it.—Los Vegas (N. M.) Optic.

Sea-sickness on Shore.

Coincidences are among the oddest things in life. The other day I tried to dine at a restaurant where they had a lot of fan things hanging from the ceiling and swinging slowly back and forth to keep the air and the flies moving. The fans, all gilt and glitter, kept up their long swell motion so steadily that soon I felt that I was on board ship and without an appetite for food, and the feeling so grew upon me that finally, to avoid an unseemly exhibition, I was forced to make my exit to terra firma and fresh air. Just as I was about restored to an even keel I came pop upon a full page picture in one of the illustrated papers of dinner hour on an ocean steamship, and off again went my stomach. It was only a coincidence, but it served the purpose of a conspiracy.—Detroit Free Press.

He Was an Adept.

He—I don't see why you think young Snibbins such a superior fellow at fishing. He catches very few fish.

She—Yes; but when he's with me he catches those few with one arm and one hand.

COWED BY STRIKERS

Tennessee Militia Surrender to a Mob of Striking Miners and Sympathizers.

Together With the Convicts They are Put on a Train and Sent to Knoxville.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., July 21.—The crisis came at Briceville to-day about 11 o'clock, when the miners and a crowd of sympathizers from the surrounding country gathered around the camp of the state militia and captured the troops and convicts, marched them off to the depot and put them on a train and shipped them to Knoxville.

The camp was on a little knoll in a hollow and surrounded on all sides by mountains. The miners and their friends to the number of twelve or fifteen hundred were divided into four equal squads and approached on the four sides of the square which the camp was formed in. The miners sent up a flag of truce and sent in a committee to the officer in command. The committee notified the officers that they had come to take the convicts peaceably if possible—by force if necessary. The officers parleyed a while and then agreed to surrender.

The troops were allowed to keep their arms and ammunition and they, with the convicts, were marched to the train. They were loaded in box cars or whatever could be had, and to this city. They arrived here about 4:30 o'clock. The troops, to the number of 107 all told, went to the armory of the Knoxville Rifles, where they now remain awaiting the orders of the governor. The miners made them promise not to return to Coal Creek. The convicts were taken to the jail, locked up and fed.

The city is now intensely excited. Leading men of all political parties say the law must be upheld. Sympathy, which had been entirely on the side of the miners, is now against them for their lawless act at a time when everything was being done to relieve the situation.

Gov. Buchanan's administration is that of the Alliance, and some of the politicians are discussing what the Alliance will do, but the great mass of citizens say the law must be observed and that Gov. Buchanan must enforce the law regardless of cost.

The sentiment here is that he must send all the state troops, who are few and poorly organized, to the front at once and put experienced men and officers in charge. If he has not force enough he MUST CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS.

A report has been circulated here that he asked the president for 500 regulars, but the truth of this cannot be verified.

It is known that the leaders of the mob were not miners either last week or to-day. One Eugene Merrill led them in each instance. He is a small merchant at Briceville, but said to be a determined man. He spoke in reply to Gov. Buchanan last week and really treated the governor with indignity. Other leaders are known, and sentiment here is that they must be arrested and taken to Nashville as the law provides and punished.

The miners have appointed a committee to say what dispatches shall be sent out, and this committee or some one of it is in the telegraph office all the time and reads all the matter sent out by the newspaper men. The committee, whether sel.-appointed or by the miners' organization, is so acting, and told the operator on duty at the key that if he did not let them read the messages they would cut the wires. The wire is a private one and does all business, including railroad and train dispatching.

of the situation is the danger to capital invested at Coal creek. Large sums of money have been invested there by men in New York and other places, and the great development of the properties is largely due to this money. Costly machinery is exposed to the fury of the mob. Citizens say such high-handed outrages as that of today will destroy public confidence and money will cease to come in for developments just started.

Yesterday many of the militia were allowed to go outside to get food and they mingled freely with the miners. These troops told the miners that they did not want to guard the convicts and to come and get them at once, that they would not fight them for the convicts. A Chattanooga company, whose members largely belonged to trades organizations, has especially acted badly and made the statements to the miners.

The mob to-day is celebrating its victory by cheering, carousing and shooting. It should be stated that a force of 500 men properly equipped and led could subdue the entire party, for they have no idea of openly facing a good force. They knew to-day from statements made them yesterday that the troops would not fight, but every one feels that the mob has made a bad mistake, and that they will be subdued. In other words, they have lost public sympathy. It is reported here that ten companies of state militia are en route, with a Gatling gun, and that they will be taken to Coal Creek at once.

The report also comes from Coal Creek late this afternoon saying the miners declare that no troops can be landed there. There are threats that they will wreck the trains or burn railway bridges.

The miners, it should be stated, are getting the best wages ever paid them, and make from $80 to $150 per month, according to how expert a man is and how steady he works.

ALL MILITIA CALLED OUT.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., July 21.—When Gov. Buchanan was advised of the situation at Briceville he at once decided to call out the entire military of the state. Each company was ordered to secure three days' rations, and tents and blankets were issued from the capitol and sent down by special train. The train pulled out at 6 o'clock with three Nashville companies, a Springfield company and one from Franklin on board, and they will pick up along the line companies from Murfreesboro, Shelbyville, Tullahoma and Sewanee. Clarksville and Lebanon companies passed through later, and four companies from Memphis and one from Jackson are also en route by special train. There are fourteen companies in all, comprising 450 men, and 100 will be taken on at Chattanooga. The Nashville train will arrive at Briceville in the morning and the Memphis train at noon.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., July 20.—The Chickasaw Guards, Hibernian Rifles, Bluff City Zouaves and the Rosier Zouaves left this city at 9:30 to-night via the Memphis & Charleston road for Briceville. The companies are small, the four turning out about 150 men, under the command of Gen. Sam Carnes.

The Maybrick Case Recalled.

LONDON, July 21.—Judgment was given today in the action brought in the interest of Mrs. Maybrick against an insurance association to recover $10,000 insurance upon her husband's life. The court decided that Mrs. Maybrick had murdered her husband, and that, consequently, she could not recover the amount for which his life was insured, as his death was caused by the person for whose benefit the action was brought. Mrs. Maybrick is the American woman who is serving a life sentence for poisoning her husband a few years ago. He was a well known Liverpool cotton merchant.

CHIPPE

It Causes Considerable Trouble and Does No Good.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, July 21.—Gov. Merriam's letter in reference to the disturbances of the Mille Lacs Indians was received at the Indian department to-day, but owing to the illness of Commissioner Morgan and absence of Assistant Commissioner Bell no action was taken.

Agent Schuler or Chairman Hall, of the Chippewa commission, have made no report as yet upon the Mille Lacs disturbances. Agent Schuler informed the bureau to-day that the Indians said they would accept no portion of the $100,000 appropriated to pay them for damages on account of overflows of the reservoirs in anything but cash. He was immediately directed by telegraph to ascertain what the Indians needed in the way of implements and clothing or any other goods and report, as the commissioner would follow the law and make the payment in such way a as he deems best.

Henry M. Rice has recommended that no payments be made in money, as the distribution of money has had a demoralizing effect upon the Chippewas. The office is allowed to furnish goods per capita to each Indian and will accept that method of making the payments. The demand for cash payments has been worked up by traders, who have incited the Indians to make this demand, as it will benefit those having goods to sell. All the petitions for payment in money have been in the same handwriting, indicating that there was "inspiration" in this latest Chippewa revolt.

The Indian office is determined to be no longer bulldozed by the Indians or the "squaw men" and traders, and if the Indians prefer trouble to what the government decides is best for them they will get it.

A HORRIBLE CHARGE.

A Rice County Man Accused of Incest by His Wife.

NORTHFIELD, Minn., Special Telegram, July 21.—A case of human degradation almost past belief was brought to light today. A frightened little woman hurried into the office of a justice of the peace and entered complaint against her husband on the charge of incest, his victim being his little twelve-year-old girl Mary. The man's name is William O'Mara, a farmer living about three miles south of this place.

The complaint states that he has been guilty of the fearful crime with which he is charged for some time past, just how long is not known, but specifies last Friday as the time when he last compelled his daughter to submit to his wishes.

His wife says that she did not become aware of the state of affairs until Friday, when her daughter Mary, who had so long been kept silent by the threats of her father, finally confessed to the thing and begged for protection. The young girl is but a child and immatured. When the mother heard her daughter's tale she at once told her husband that she would see that he was punished, whereupon, it is alleged, he threatened to shoot her, but she was firm, and escaping from him, entered the complaint.

The case will be tried to-morrow, and O'Mara will plead not guilty. It will be conducted with closed doors, as it is feared an attempt may be made to lynch him. The thing has been kept very quiet; and very few people know anything about it.

MURDER SUSPECTED.

Mr. Wilkerson of Eldora, Iowa, Thought to Have Met With Foul Play,

ELDORA, Iowa, Special Telegram, July 21.—Another weary day's search Sunday failed to develop anything new in the Wilkerson case or the man who is supposed to have been drowned here Wednesday.

Supt. Miller, of the state industrial school, sent out over a hundred boys yesterday morning and with the aid of another hundred Eldora men these boys waded the river shoulder to shoulder for two miles from the mill dam to the coal banks and not an inch of the river bottom was left uncovered. This has perfectly satisfied the community and Mr. Wilkerson's family that his body is not in the river.

Wilkerson was well and favorably known here, and has run a telegraphic institute here for two years and was doing well. He was not in financial straits to any extent. He belongs to the K. of P., Masonic and A. O. U. W. lodges and carries a life insurance policy in the Workman for $5,000. He leaves a small family who will be looked after.

It is thought by many that he has been murdered and his body buried and clothing left in the boat in order to convey the idea that he had drowned while bathing. His wife, whose health is in a very poor condition, declares that he has been basely murdered.

FATHER OR SON?

One Supposed to Be Responsible for the Cremation of a Family.

CLAY CITY, Ill., July 21.—This moring all that remained of the James family, living five miles west of here, was found in the ruins of their home, which was evidently burned during the night. The family consisted of husband, wife, son, daughter and grandchild. It is thought that either son or father murdered the family, committed suicide and then set fire to the house. The son was addicted to the use of whisky, and had threated to kill the family, and the father was subject to seasons of insanity.

An Unknown Suicide.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., July 21.—Yesterday the body of an unknown white man was found hanging from a tree near Pratt Mines, a suburban town. His features were already past recognition. He was well dressed and the only thing about him that may serve to identify the man is the letter "T" and figures "12" embroidered on a white silk handkerchief; also a piece of brown paper with the words "Smith Brothers, Hillman," written on it. He had seemingly climbed a small sapling, leaned over, tied the rope around the trunk of the large tree and jumped off. Nothing has been developed to support the theory of murder. The question is, "Who is he?"

Insurgents Defeated.

WASHINGTON, July 2.—A telegram received to-day by the Chilian minister affirms the news of the defeat of the insurgents at Huasco. The insurgent cavalry, commanded by Col. Saavedia, fled leaving 200 dead and a great number of prisoners with all their arms. It is said the defeated troops were considered to be the finest soldiers in the insurgent army.

A Riot in a Church.

NEOSHO, Mo., July 21.—During a religious meeting at Tiff City, last night, a number of roughs attempted to break up the meeting. The minister commanded them to be quiet, whereupon one of the roughs knocked him down with a club. The justice of the peace, with young Hopkins, son of Postmaster Hopkins, and several others, attempted to arrest the roughs. They met with resistance, clubs and stones being used against the officers. Young Hopkins then fired upon them, killing John Cook and shooting the left hand off one of the rioters. Hopkins surrendered to the sheriff. More trouble is expected to follow.

THE AGRICULTURAL WORLD

WORDS OF ADVICE FOR THE FARMER.

About Milking--Feeding Value of Whey--Thoughts About Sheep--Salt the Cows--Result of Rough Treatment.

About Milking.

The first thing in milking is to see that the udder is clean. Wipe the udders of all the cows to be milked with a flannel cloth wrung out in lukewarm water and dry them immediately. The milker should then wash and dry his hands and see that there are no long or broken nails. Commence now to stroke gently the teats and udder a few seconds, to excite the flow of milk and to relax the muscles which close the mouth of the teats. Now grasp the two furthest off teats in such a way that the little finger is just out of reach of the milk as it issues from the teat. For it is absolutely necessary that the hands are kept dry from start to finish. The milk cannot be kept perfectly clean when the hands are wet, no matter how carefully both udder and hands have been washed and dried; and milk, as all know, readily absorbs any dirt or dirty smell and imparts it to butter or cheese. But a yet weightier consideration is that diseases of the teats and udder, especially sore and cracked teats, are to a very large degree attributable to nothing else than wet milking, while the danger of infection being conveyed from one animal to another is increased enormously. Taking care, therefore, to keep the little finger away from the milk, proceed to drive the milk out of the teat by a steadily increasing pressure (remember not by pulling), commencing the pressure with the thumb and first finger and following rapidly with second, third and fourth fingers. Now loosen your grasp and raise the hand into the udder, as it were, giving a gentle shove or blow so as to bring the milk down into the lower portion of the udder. Then repeat the squeeze, but take care never to stretch the teat the least bit beyond its natural length, or serious internal ruptures might result; besides, this stretching the teats makes milking very unpleasant to the cow. Even at the end, never resort to stripping—that is, sliding two or three finfingers down the teat, which is kept lubricated with milk, but continue squeezing the milk out till no more will come, and even then go on for a few seconds to encourage the flow of blood to the udder; then do the same to the two near teats. The quick, soft push into the lower portion of the udder is exactly what a calf does when suction no longer brings it any milk. It opens its mouth slightly so as to take in a larger portion of the udder, and gives it a gentle poke with its nose, whereupon it resumes sucking.

Too rapid and violent milking is not enjoyable to the the cow and will cause her to "hold up" her milk, and slow milking makes her wearied. Conversation among the milkers should most strictly be forbidden. The position of the milker is often such that he cannot see whether all the milk goes into the pail or not, and he must consequently trust to his hearing. And an interesting conversation is not conducive to attentive listening to the sound of the milk pail.

Feeding Value of Whey.

Four trials were conducted at the Wisconsin experiment station during the fall of 1890-91, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of sweet whey for pig feeding. The results of these trials show:

First—We are not successful in maintaining pigs on whey alone.

Second—Pigs fed on corn meal and shorts with water required 552 pounds of the mixture for 100 pounds of grain.

Third—When whey was added to the corn meal and shorts mixture, it produced a marked saving in the amount of grain required for good grain. This was true for mixtures varying from two pounds of whey to one of grain, up to ten pounds of whey to one of grain.

Fourth—It was found when using whey as a partial substitute for grain, that 760 pounds of whey effected a saving of 100 pounds of the corn meal and shorts mixture.

Fifth—Using these figures, if corn meal and shorts are valued at $12 per ton, then whey is worth eight cents per hundred pounds; at $15 per ton for the corn meal and shorts, whey would be worth ten cents per hundred weight.

Sixth—Shorts, pea meal and oil meal, or like foods, should be mixed with whey for growing animals. Some corn may be fed at all times, the proportion increasing as the animal approaches maturity.—Ohio Farmer.

Salt the Cows.

It is hardly necessary to tell people who handle stock that they should be salted regularly. It seems to be as necessary as food itself, judging from the way they will beg for it. Not only is it relished, but observation and experience teach that salt is necessary to the best health of a cow. Prof. Robinson, of the Guelph experimental station, Ontario, says, after experimenting along that line, that "to deny cows salt for even one week reduces their flow of milk 14½ to 17½ per cent in quantity and lowers the quality." Milk given when the cows are deprived of salt, he says, "will sour 24 hours sooner than that given when they have a full supply of it. It is greatly relished by all animals, which is a strong presumtive evidence in its favor, and there cannot be a reasonable doubt at this late day that salt is beneficial to milch cows."

Thoughts About Sheep.

Some people seem to think that sheep can live anywhere. They will turn them into the road where the grass is covered with dust, forgetting that a sheep is as dainty about its food as its master.—Others will keep them in a brier patch, where grass must struggle for existence, let them run here all summer, and in the fall they will come out thin and gaunt, and with their fleeces ruined. Others stock their fields too heavily. Sheep are like other animals—put too many on a field and they will crop it too close, ruining the pasture. They want frequent changes of pasture, to do well. They like hill lands the best, and seem to do better on them. They should be salted twice a week. In winter, sheep should be well sheltered in bad, stormy weather, with plenty of good clover hay and pure water. Then they will thrive. If you allow them out in storms, with poor or insufficient food, they will grow thin and the wool becomes dead. Ewes with lamb, under such treatment, do not pass yeaning time safely, and will lack nutriment for their puny lambs. There is loss in all such sheep husbandry.

Ewes should not have much grain before lambing, but what they do have should be bran, oats and corn ground together. After a ewe drops her lamb put her in a place by herself. Have a shed for this purpose, where you can bunch them in lots of ten or fifteen. You can oversee them better, and detect anything that goes wrong, and when you go in among them they haven't room to run around, as in a large shed, tramping on their lambs, etc.—Ohio Farmer.

Result of Rough Treatment.

Among the brute creation man has no better friend than the horse. With them, however, as with human beings, much depends upon early training. An exchange speaking upon this subject, says that "a gentle horse is more than it would be if not gentle. What is termed viciousness in horses is frequently nothing but sheer timidity, and almost invariably is the result of rough treatment. Horses would not give way to fear when man approaches them if they had been accustomed to receive always kind and humane treatment. Now that the season for putting the young colts into the hands of trainers is at hand, it is a good time to commence teaching them not to fear the approach of a human being. They are fond of being petted, and with constant kindness will become quite docile. A nubbin of corn, a handful of grain or a little sugar offered occasionally will gain their confidence, and they will gradually lose all fear of mankind. The spirit of trustfulness thus inspired, and the resulting gentleness of disposition, will last through life, unless adverse influences are allowed to intervene."

Pinkeye Contagious.

Dr. Fleming, principal veterinary surgeon of the British army, is of the opinion that the veterinary authorities of this country are correct in regarding "pinkeye" in horses as a contagious and infectious specific fever transmissible directly from animal to animal. He said, further, that persons passing from a sick animal to a healty one would convey the disease. It was undoubtedly due to one or more germs, there might be two or three germs producing it; but there were grounds for believing that the germs could develop not only in the animal body but outside it—in the atmosphere. Only on that behalf could they account for certain outbreaks. Although the mortality attending the latest outbreak has been greater than in any other, they would have to schedule the whole country to stop it; and he thought the time had not yet arrived for that. He advised those who had horses to observe closely the prevalence of the disease, and, if they saw symptoms of it, to rest the horses at once.

Farm Notes.

Growing stock should not be kept too fat during hot weather.

With working machinery of all kinds the best oil is the cheapest.

Pond water is about the poorest that can be supplied to stock, especially during the summer.

Our advantage in growing roots for winter feeding is, that very large yields can be secured.

The cultivation of tobacco in British North Borneo is rapidly increasing. The output for last year was 1,500,000 pounds.

Whenever a plant runs to vine, it is nearly always at the expense of fruit. The better plan is to pinch back the running shoots.

French parents possessing seven or more chidlren have certain exemptions from taxation. In France there are 150,000 families so exempted.

Good, fat mutton makes one of the best fresh meats for the farmers' table. In a majority of cases, it will be found cheap as well as wholesome.

The practice of washing the sheep before shearing has to a very large extent, been abandoned as being unprofitable; the difference in prices are not sufficient to pay for the work and loss of weight.

Last year the executive committee of the Illinois state grange offered a prize of $10,000 for a device that could be attached to a self binder, to use straw instead of wire for binding twine, and it is claimed that they "have it."

TAKEN BY TARTARS.

In 1873 I was sub-lieutenant in the British Royal Navy, serving on Her Majesty's gunboat Tickler, commanded by First Lieut. (now Captain) Charles Napier. We were cruising in Chinese waters, keeping our eyes open for a lot of Tartar pirates who are the pests of those seas, and are dreaded by all honest trading vessels. We were lying at the mouth of the Ho-Tong, a small river or creek emptying into the Pacific, and Commander Napier had sent me, with a boatswain named Joe Maxted and a launch's crew of twelve men, up the creek to hunt for and, if possible, destroy the stronghold of a certain Tartar pirate who had recently made himself particularly obnoxious.

We got into the creek and rowed up about five miles without finding anything or anybody, and without being molested in any way whatever. Then I thought we had gone far enough, but being young and panting for glory, I determined to reconnoitre a little further inland. So taking with me Joe Maxted and two men, and giving orders to the men left in charge of the boat that if we did not return in forty-eight hours they were to come in search of us, we started upon what was undoubtedly a very foolhardy trip.

The whole river bank on either side was a dense jungle for about half a mile, breaking into a belt of pine forest and then into the open. Here and there were narrow cuttings down to the river side—the river was only about eighty feet wide, about the width of a fairly wide street—and occasionally one came upon a tiny village with a clearing and small rice farms. The inhabitants of these villages, we suspected, all took a hand in the piratical excursions which the Tickler was endeavoring to suppress, but on the present occasion it was the head man of a small tribe, which even attacked the village pirates themselves, that we were after.

It was early morning—about 5 o'clock—when we started out upon our excursion. We thought to take advantage of the cool morning air and, if necessary, rest in the shade during the intense heat of the day. Of course we were well armed. We each carried a Colts's navy revolver, the men had each a rifle and cutlass and I my sword. Being fully aware of the possibility of losing our way and not getting back to the boat, we blazed the trees along our route and cut a fair path through the undergrowth. We also kept a lookout for ambushes, for their was little doubt that our pirate knew perfectly well that we were after him. We were not quite so well acquainted with the country as he, however. We made the discovery too late and to our bitter cost.

After about two hours' cutting and hacking at the dense undergrowth and having reached the belt of pine trees I ordered a halt, and we sat down to breakfast. For two of our party it was their last meal. I do not know how it happened, for I had risen to my feet and was again moving onward expecting the men to follow instantly, when I heard Joe Maxted's vioce shouting to me:

"Mr. Martin! Lie down on your face! Flat down for God's sake!"

It saved my life. I just turned an instant, in time to see my two poor ablebodied seamen on their backs with a dozen arrows in the body of each, and Joe on his face on the ground. The whole wood seemed to be alive with the most horridly rigged Tartar villains I ever set eyes on. Some had masks on their faces and all carried Javelins and great swords. Well, I threw up my hands. I couldn't do less.

In an instant we were surrounded, and, leaving the two dead bodies where they lay, we were dragged along until we came to a large clearing about a quarter of a mile away, the existence of which we had never suspected. Here was a sort of a village of bamboo huts, little more than an encampment of about eighty or a hundred men. Not more. We were in the hands of the pirates we had come to exterminate. There was nothing for it. They would exterminate us. We had not a chance. Our men wouldn't come after us for two days. There was no hope of a release. We might just as well make up our minds to it.

Up to this time we had been so far apart, separated by our guards, that we could not speak to each other, or suggest any plans. When we reached the clearing, however, we were brought together, and marched before the most villainous looking rascal I ever set my eyes on—evidently the chief of the band. Joe was filling the air with the most lovely and choice selections from his truly magnificent vocabulary of Billingsgate, and calling upon each and every separate Tartar to let him have the use of his hands and his cutlass and meet him on fair ground. What would they do with us? We were very soon to know.

With a hospitality we could not understand, the chief signed us to sit down, and presently a great dish of delicious rice was placed before us and we were by signs invited to eat. Our morning trip had made us both hungry notwithstanding that we had already had some breakfast, and not even the sad memory of the death of our comrades could prevent our "pitching in." Then come bowls of most refreshing, sparkling spring water. What would come next?

We noticed, as we finished our repast, a perfectly hellish grin spread over the features of our host. He made a sign and said something which we, of course did not understand. Two fellows came up and evidently said all was ready, for at another few words we were seized, made to stand on our feet, our arms bound securely to our sides, our ankles tied together and we were dragged off. Joe's oaths were a caution. I wish I could print one of them! They would frighten a Bowery bartender.

Presently we came to a spot where not a tree of any kind formed the slightest protection from the sun's rays, and where at a distance of about six feet apart we saw two large deep holes.

"Now what are they going to do?" asked Joe.

I had no time to answer, for in a minute we were dumped, feet foremost, one into each hole. Then the beggars began shoveling the sandy soil in on top of us.

"They're going to bury us alive!" said Joe.

It was worse than that. That would have killed us too soon. They only buried us to the necks, leaving our heads free, but so securely fixed in the soil that we looked like a couple of living heads on a magician's table. Great God! what horribly conceived torture was this! While we were buried helpless there a brute came and with a sharp knife carefully shaved a round patch from the tops of our heads, then another smeared some sticky substance thereon. Were they going to set fire to us? Worse even than that!

Do not suppose that all this was done in silence. By no means. A horrible, yelling, jeering, hooting crowd surrounded us, and now they came and threw beastliness of every description at us, spat in our faces and slapped us with flat pieces of bamboo. This went on for a couple of hours, and the sun was beating down upon us with almost unbearable power. Then the flies came in myriads and bit and stung us, and the stench from the filth that had been thrown at us was stifling and inconceivably sickening. Then came a cry from Maxted, which I quickly echoed:

"I'm bursting! If this don't stop soon I'll burst!"

The rice and water we had swallowed was swelling, and the weight of the soil creating an enormous resistance, our agony was intense.

"Great God! Why didn't we tell the men to come sooner?"

Then poured forth another volley of oaths and curses from Joe, and the cheeriest words of encouragement to me a man could think of.

"They'll never obey you sir: they'll get anxious and come."

His words were prophetic. They were hardly out of his mouth when we heard the heartiest British cheer I ever heard ring through the clearing—then a volley and another from good British rifles, and then the short snapping of the revolvers—and then I fainted.

A week later, lying in my little cabin on the Tickler, I heard how one of the men, angry at not being chosen to make the inland excursion with me, had followed us a short distance through the forest. He had seen the attack and at once scampered back to the boat. Realizing that ten men would be of little use against so many Tartars, they had rowed down the river right back to the Tickler, reported my capture to Commander Napier, who had come himself with a young brigade to my rescue, with the results that you have already read.

Every pirate in that scoundrelly crew was shot or cutlassed in the attack. Not one escaped. T. L. R.

RUSTIC GUILELESSNESS.

How the Farmer Keeps Up the Price of Eggs in Hatching Season.

"Nice eggs, ain't they?" said a man at Wood River station the other day, as he picked up a sample of "hen fruit" from a pail that a fellow passenger carried.

"Yes," responded the owner of the eggs, "they're pretty good looking. Blooded stock," he continued; "but as I only paid 25 cents for them I guess they won't hatch."

"Why how is that?" said the ignorant Providence Journal man who stood near.

"Well you see," replied the man with the eggs, "if these eggs were sold for hatching they would fetch over $1 a bakers dozen, being of blooded stock, but, the supply being greater than the demand, they were sold for eating purposes at the regular rate of 22 cents. The farmer, though to guard against their use for 'setting,' has run a fine needle through the butt end of each so as to just pierce the inner skin, a trick that does away effectually with hatching it."

This little scheme of the guileless farmer to keep up the price of hatching eggs in season was new to the city man, but his informant said it was a practice as old as the hills.

A Dead Indian's Bottle.

Robert Debord, a young man who lives two miles below town, writes the Ellijay correspondent of the Atlanta Constitution, was plowing in his field recently, when his plow caught against something which attracted his attention. Upon examination Mr. Debord found a quart cup, two pint cups and a bottle. He soon discovered human bones, and decided that he had found an Indian grave. Continuing the search, Mr. Debord was soon in possession of a lot of Indian jewels and beads.

Among the jewels were found a small silver finger ring, two silver ear-drops, a silver chain, two or three silver buckles, one of which had a feather carved upon it, and one in the shape of a heart. There was also another large silver jewel, supposed to have been worn in the nose. Some of the jewels were soldered together, thus proving that the Indians understood the art of soldering. Tradition says that the Indians in this section handled a great deal of silver, which they obtained in the mountains near by, and the finding of silver jewels and ornaments in their graves carries out the idea that there are silver mines in this section.

Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P. M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7;45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

To Bond the County

For $500,000,—That is What the Principal and Interest Will Amount to.

Don't Vote a Debt Upon Your Children.

The county has been flooded with circulars the past week sent out by the executive committee of the "Business Men's Union." Where this Union exists is a mystery; but nevertheless the gist of the circular is an argument on behalf of the issuing of the bonds in aid of the Duluth and Dakota railroad. The president and secretary of this corporation have signed an agreement to build the road "to a point in the city of Crookston in said Polk county and state of Minnesota" and to carry wheat to Duluth for 12½ cents per hundred pounds. An election has been called August 25th to vote for and against issuing the bonds. The date for holding the election is time a when every farmer in Polk county will be busily engaged in the harvest field. Fearing the scheme to bond the county would not carry, these sharpers have managed to have the date of election set just at the time when only those who are interested in the scheme, of robbing by taxation, will quit their harvesters and go to the polls to vote for the issuing of the bonds. Farmers not directly interested in the road will remain at home and it is thus by default the "Business Men's Union" hope to carry the election. We however think that those who are so solicitous about the farmers' welfare and laud the proposition to carry wheat for 12½ cents per hundred pounds, should not strive to deny them the right of suffrage, knowing the farmer must remain at home and attend to the harvesting of his crops. Crookston is behind this scheme and while we are satisfied to have that city obtain all the rail facilities she can we are opposed to taxing the people outside for the benefit of the few who reside within her limits or along the line of the proposed route. If the railroad company desired to be fair and remunerate the people of the whole county for the bonds about to be voted why should they not guarantee in their written agreement to build the main line or branches to different parts of the county and to other villages and cities. Can they expect that the scheme will be supported when the citizens and farmers remote from the proposed road cannot derive benefit from it. Why should the city of Crookston be deserving of more consideration than other localities? The sentiment in this section is strongly against voting the bonds unless the D. & D. officials guarantee by written agreement to either build the main line or branch into Red Lake Falls. The promises of railroad officials don't go. Every city and village in the county will undoubtedly be promised the road. How far the people will be hoodwinked remains to be seen.

Minnesota Flax.

The following, from the Austin, (Minn) Register, shows what vast resources lie unused in our state, and gives plainly a method of wealth production: Some time ago McMillan & Hastings, real estate, loan and insurance agents, of Minneapolis, purchased a large tract of land near Moscow, consisting of 6,000 acres, the most of which was at that time considered low and unvaluable soil. They have since, however, demonstrated that, to the contrary, it is the finest land to be found in the West. A system of drainage was at once begun, and today that which was known as Rice lake, contains the most fertile growth of flax ever seen in this part of the country. Antoine Friedrich made a visit to that place yesterday, in company with one of the proprietors and an artist who was taken to secure views of its marvelous developments. Before his return he secured a sample of flax grown there, which is of the Belgium species, measuring over three feet in hight, and is now on exhibition at this office. The gentlemen have 200 acres in this product, and have been offered $10 per acre for the straw alone. "The improvements that are going on there," says Mr. Friedrich, "are simply incomprehensible without one pays the place a visit." Two artesian wells are being completed, and several large, substantial buildings are under erection and plans are being perfected for more. If any one thinks that this is not a flax section the idea can be easily expelled by taking a drive through our fertile country. The Belgium flax gives evidence of succeeding our native flax for many reasons. First, it is productive of a finer fiber, and second, it produces almost equally the same amount of grain to the acre. The Belgium straw can be marketed at the lowest figure at $10 per ton, while our New York flax men agree to pay only $3 per ton for our native straw. The difference in the straw is the manner in which it grows. The Belgium flax, as can be seen by the specimens at this office, grows to an enormous height, thereby making it very valuable to the manufacturers of fiber, Nothing short of twelve inches can be used, so says Mr. Rothermel, of the New York Flax Fiber Company, who are preparing to establish an extensive plant here, therefore the Belgium flax is bound to be brought in to take the place of our home-grown seed. The flax business in the Northwest, and especially in this locality, is just beginning to receive attention, and we believe, eventually, that it will be the source of attracting alarge concourse of manufacturing enterprises, heretofore almost unthought of.

The Great Northern

A Sure Road For Red Lake Falls, St. Hilaire, Thief River Falls and Fosston.

The Prospective Route, and Proposed Connection.

R. A. Wilkinson, in company with Hon. Marcus Johnson, is in the city to-day interviewing citizens and looking up the most feasible crossings of the Clearwater and Red Lake rivers. Mr. Wilkinson is right-of-way agent for the Great Northern and whatever statements he makes can be relied upon. He says it is the intention of the company to connect the new line now being built through to Fosston with the line running on the east side of the Red River of the North. The line will therefore necessarily strike Thief River Falls, St. Hilaire and Red Lake Falls. The people should take the building of this road into consideration before voting bonds in aid of a road which will guarantee nothing save building within the city limits of Crookston. The Great Northern had in contemplation the construction of this line for over a year but have been awaiting developments in the manufacturing interests of Red Lake Falls. Now that these are assured the company intend to soon commence the construction of the road. Connections will this fall be made with the line running to St. Hilaire and a market be made here for this fall's crop. Already the people here feel jubilant. The vast resources of this city, in its water powers, the fine agricultural country here—with the Northern Pacific and Great Northern rail roads to carry out the manufactured articles, we cannot but thrive and we predict a large influx of people and prosperity to one and all. Our citizens should now unite in giving Messrs. Wilkinson and Johnson all the encouragement within their power.

A Fatal Accident.

Albert Krueger, the Ten Year Old Son of Fred Krueger, Run Over by A Load of Hay Weighing About Fifty Hundred.

There are sad events in life, and one of these is the untimely death of little Albert Krueger, son of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Krueger. Mr. Krueger, Albert and a younger brother, were returning hom Tuesday on a load of hay, and when on the Schmidt hill Albert slipped off the front of the load, behind the horses, falling flat on his face. The heavily-weighted wheels passed over him before the team could be stopped. Mr. Krueger was on the ground at the time, tying the wheel for a break. The team was left in charge of a man who happened along and Mr. Krueger carried the poor mangled form to the residence of Dr. Watson. It was found that his ribbs were broken, his arm bones pulverized and his lungs and liver smashed. A slight hope was entertained that he might survive, but yesterday morning he breathed his last, after suffering intensely all night. Albert was fully conscious ten minutes before he died and hopes that he might recover were entertained till then. He was a handsome, intellectual boy, about ten years old; a brave, manly, generous fellow, the pride of his parents, and admired by all who knew him; always the first in his classes in school—it is no wonder the fond parents are broken down with anguish. The poor mother is simply inconsolable, refusing food or rest. All that kind, sympathetic friends can do is being done. The funeral will occur at 2 p. m., the interment to be made in the Riecher cemetery.

Spears' Coup.

Thirteen Towns.

W. R. Spears, the well known Red Lake trader, arrived in the city on Tuesday evening from White Earth on his way home, having been called there to quiet the threatened outbreak among the people of that reservation, as no other man has so much influence over them and is held in such respect among them. They all have the greatest confidence in his honesty, integrity and veracity. He soon had things quieted down after his presence among them became generally known. He says that the danger of an outbreak had been magnified out of all proportions of the actual state of affairs by the city dailies, which seemed to be trying to make a big sensation and raise a big scare out of a small and perfectly harmless proceeding by the Indians: that in fact there was absolutely no danger of an outbreak, as the whole affair was a little scheme invented by his own fertile imagination in order to bring the government to terms in regard to the payment of the damages to their rice fields and lands, caused by the building of the dams, and just as soon as he thought things had gone far enough to accomplish this end, he stepped in and called a halt, and white winged peace reigned supreme once more. He says that the money for payment of these claims will be forthcoming in the near future, and he is congratulating himself on the success of his neat little ruse, in bluffing the government in coming to time. He had no personal interest at all in the payment of these claims, but acted purely in a spirit of unselfishness, and for the benefit of the Indians, whom he thought stood in need of his inventive genius in order to obtain justice from the government. The idea is certainly a novel one and no one else would probably ever have thought of such a scheme. The people whom he has thus aided in obtaining their rights will undoubtedly lay up a large chunck of gratitude for him. He left for home yesterday morning. He was accompanied on his return trip by the chief of the Red Lake band who has been at White Earth in the interest of his band. He acts almost wholly upon the advice of Mr. Spears and generally comes out about right in all of his transaction. It would be impossible to obtain a better counselor and advisor.

J. F. DOYLE.

To the People of Minnesota.

The State of Minnesota, to be appropiately represented at the World's Columbian Exposition, needs at least a hundred thousand dollars in addition to the amount at present available.

The Commission, feeling that the deep interest manifested throughout the State should have some public and formal expression; believing also that some better plan for raising this additional sum, than the one most favorably considered by them may be suggested, have decided to call a convention for this two-fold purpose, to be held in the Hall of Representatives at St. Paul, on Tuesday morning, August 13th, at 10 o'clock, to which convention each Chamber of Commerce, Board of Trade, City and Village Council in every city throughout the State is invited to send two delegates.

In counties where there are no such organized bodies, the chairman of the board of County Commissioners is requested to appoint the delegates.

We earnestly desire that the newspapers of the State, always ready to aid in every move which may prove of benefit to our commonwealth, will bring their mighty influence to the support of the Commission in this matter.

In no way can the Commission ascertain the wishes of the people except through the medium of the press or the gathering of a representative body of citizens.

If with full knowledge of the vast benefits to be derived from a proper display of our resources and advantages; if, after being advised as to the gigantic preparations in contemplation by some of our sister States, the people of Minnesota decide that $50,000 sufficient with which to exhibit and advertise our unequaled attractions for people of all classes and conditions, we will undertake to make such an exhibit as the means at our command will warrant. But we can not believe that such will be their verdict.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

There is a tract in Levy county, Florida, in which three holes have been dug thirty feet apart, and each excavation has laid bare parts of the skeleton of a huge animal. The diggers take it for granted that the bones all belong to the same creature and are wondering what sort of a beast it was whose remains underlie the county.

The Shipping Point

And Postal Route For the Red Lake Reservation—that is What we Will

Be by the Use of a Little Energy and a Long Pole.

The goverement supplies to Red Lake have hitherto been shipped to Detroit. Last week Fosston was made the receiving point. We have it from reliable authority that if our road to Red Lake was slightly improved there would be no difficulty in getting the freight shipped to this point. At present the North Side Roller Mills furnish all the flour for W. R. Spears, partly, doubtless from the superior excellency of the flour and partly because the road from here to Red Lake is by far the best. There are but a few bad stretches, which, if fixed up, would make it practically the only feasible route. At present much of the provisions for Red Lake come this way, but we want the government freight and the mail service. About four hundred tons of freight for Red Lake is annually handled and it behooves our citizens to look into the matter. Let the council, at the next meeting, take action on this question inasmuch as the outlook is so clear to success.

Specimen Cases.

S. H. Clifford, New Cassel, Wis., was troubled with Neuralgia and Rheumatism, his Stomach was disordered, his Liver was affected to an alarming degree, appetite fell away and he was terrible reduced in flesh and strength. Three bottles of Electric Bitters cured him. Edward Shepherd, Harrisburg, Ill., had a running sore on his leg of eight years' standing. Used three boxes of Electric Bitters and seven boxes of Bucklin's Arnica Salve, and his leg is sound and well. John Speaker, Catawba, O., had five large Fever sores on his leg, doctors said he was incurable. One bottle Electric Bitters and one box Buclin's Arnica Salve cured him entirely. Sold by W. A. Schreiter's Drug store.

SUFFICIENCY.

A little love, of heaven a little share,
And then we go—what matters it? since where,
Or when, or how, none may aforetime know,
Nor if death cometh soon, or lingering slow,
Send on ahead his herald of despair.

On this gray life Love lights with golden glow
Refracted from The Source, his bright wings throw
Its glory on us, if Fate grant our prayer—
A little love.

A little; 'tis as much as we may bear,
For Love is compassioned with such magic air
Who breathes it fully dies; and knowing so
The gods all wisely but a taste bestow
For little lives, a little while they spare
A little love.

THE SEFTON BLOOD.

BY ESTHER SERLE KENNETH.

It was very hot and had been ungoverned so many generations that, to consider, it became a necessity with those having connection with the Seftons. A passionate, affectionate, clanish race, very headstrong, very rich, they had long been a power in the land, notwihstanding the characteristic of quick, ungovernable anger. Not that Ogden Sefton had not tried to control his fiery temper while his wife lived—at least he thought he had—but if he had been less often angry, it was rather because of her gentle influence and tact than that he had really disciplined himself. And when his wife died, people said. "And now there will be trouble with Victor."

Victor, with his handsome Byronic head, covered by close curling black hair, his dash and grace and extra share of the hot Sefton blood—it was not six months before there was trouble.

"How dare you, sir."

Father and son stood facing each other in the handsome library, and it was Ogden Sefton who had spoken.

"Because I am not a boy. I love Ada Grandmont and mean to marry her."

"Ungrateful rascal, to defy your father! So this is your first step on coming of age?"

"I am not obliged to sleep another night under your roof, sir—and I will not!"

And so Victor Sefton dashed passicnately frcm his home, and did not return.

If Victor's mother had been alive!—but there was no one to interfere with a pacific word between the hotheads. The discovery that Victor was paying court to the daughter of a man who had given him offense was the cause of the trouble, which increased as Victor was approached on the subject, for he loved the innocent girl his father referred to so coldly. At first intimation that his son differed from him Ogden Sefton flew into a passion. A few hasty words, and his handsome boy he was so proud of was lost to him.

Victor, on passing out, had said to his sister that he should never return—that he was going abroad. A week had passed, and Olive's dark syes were swollen with crying. yet not one word had her father spoken of his secret relenting. She was like her mother, gentle judicious, winning, and yet more affectionate than the others. To lose her mother and then her brother broke the girl's heart.

But her swollen eyes were all the expressions of her grief. She so feared her father in his anger, usually indulgent as he was, that she dared not name her absent brother until he abruptly broached the subject.

"Olive, do you know where Victor is?"

"No, father."

"Have you heard nothing from him?"

"No, sir. But—father—I think he has gone abroad."

"He had not the means."

"No, sir; but he could have borrowed money."

And as the weeks and months went by, this conclusion was forced upon Ogden Sefton. Victor had college friends who were off for London that summer—probably he had gone with them. Though cut to the heart, Olive was right in thinking that her father would make his inquiries. So fiery was his anger that even in his grief the memory of it made him angry again. He had lost his son. He had only his daughter. And by tenderly loving her he tried to cancel the wrong done and relieve the secret sorrow of his heart. He even met Olive in the street with Ada Grandmont, yet made no sign.

Olive liked pretty, brown-eyed Ada, who had been her school friend. She had another confident, Roland Harlow.

He was a young gentleman, reliable as agreeable, whom everybody had confidence in—Ogden Sefton included, and he very much admired Olive. To this connection her father was not adverse. Roland was the son of his partner in business. His frequency at the house made him like one of the family.

He had dined one day at Mr. Sefton's table. There was other gentlemen present, and Olive presided at the table with the gentle dignity which made her, in her extreme youth and beauty, very attractive.

It was a quiet family dinner, yet Olive left the gentlemen half an hour to their wine; and while the others were engaged in a discussion, Mr. Sefton bent his head and said, in a low voice to Roland, who sat next him:

"Wait this evening after the others have gone. I want to talk to you."

Roland, noticed for the first time, a haggard, sunken look about Mr. Sefton's eyes, and a look of solicitude came into his frank, blonde face.

It was two hours before he was able to say. "Now we are alone." The company had gone, Olive had retired to her room. They sat by the library fire.

As the young man looked at his friend sitting in his velvet lounging-chair before the glowing anthracite, surrounded on every side by luxury, he thought he had never beheld a more unhappy countenance. There were new lines in the handsome face, and the close-curling brown hair was whitened above the temples.

"I have confidence in you, Roland, and I must talk to some one."

"Thank you, Mr. Sefton. Can I help you?"

"My children!"

Mr. Sefton covered his face with his hands. Alarmed, Roland waited. His companion could not sit in his chair; but rose and walked the floor.

"You know how Victor went away, Roland. My only son! His mother was so proud of him—"

He broke down again.

"I may never see Victor again. But Olive, my little girl, she was always different—mild and patient like her mother—yet not without strength of mind. I have based all my hopes of the future on her of late. Yet she—

"Dear Mr. Sefton, what can have gone wrong with Olive?"

Roland Harlow's face was anxious enough now.

"It is impossible for me to think any harm of my daughter. She has ever been purity and truth itself. It is my own remorse that makes me shrink from seeking her confidence."

"What has happened?"

"Night after night Olive steals from her room and leaves the house. She is often absent till past midnight. And she says nothing of this nightly habit—evidently thinks it unknown. You understand, Roland, that I cannot force myself to believe any ill of Olive. I will not believe that she seeks bad company."

"No; no indeed!"

"Then what does this mean? I have not her confidence. I have lost my children's confidence!" and passionate, loving Ogden Sefton covered his face and wept in unutterable sorrow.

"Mr. Sefton, if you asked an explanation of Olive, I think she would give it to you."

"Roland, I have thought of this matter until I am almost ill. One thing I am convinced of. If Olive wishes to maintain secrecy regarding this matter she will do so. Mind, if she does—and I sometimes fear I dare not say what! But it is killing me that my child does not trust me.

"Don't worry so, Mr. Sefton. I will try to help you."

"How?"

"It is a delicate matter; but I am sure Olive does not fear me. Perhaps I can lead her to confide in me of her own free choice."

"God bless you, Roland!—try, try. I would give the world to be relieved of this anxiety!"

* * * * * *

By a thousand ingenious but ineffectual ways Roland Harlow strove to surprise Olive's secret, but never succeeded. The same which was the keynote to it he never thought to utter; and the girl was too wrapped in her own thoughts and feelings to observe the singularity of his. A fortnight had gone by, when she declined to attend a concert with him, and bidding him good-night in the hall ascended to her room. Roland let himself out, and, crossing the park, sat down under the trees in the balmy spring evening.

The truth was, he was overwhelmed by his thoughts, and sat racking his brain longer than he knew, for he was suddenly surprised by the sight of Olive, wrapped in a gray waterproof and veil, emerging from the door of her house. She came quickly down the high stone steps, was joined at the corner of the park by Ada Grandmont, and the two walked rapidly away. Before he knew what he was doing he was following them.

Leaving the aristocratic quarter of the city, they sought one less pretentious, and then their steps grew slower. Arm in arm, they paced slowly along looking about them, and talking in low tones. Before the entrance of stores, theaters and other public places, they stopped ond waited for a considerable time. At the door of two or three private houses they stopped and rang, but Roland dared not approach near enough to get any clew to their business.

They went down one side of the street, and came back upon the other; at last, when the clocks were striking 11, returning home. They reached the park. Ada Grandmont's residence being near Olive's the latter had but a few steps to go along before the door of her house closed softly upon her, and soon appeared a light in her chamber window.

Twice Roland sought and found opportunity to follow Olive in the same way. She was always accompanied by Ada. The temerity which enabled these choicely bred young girls to repeat this walk night after night, in all kinds of weather, was equaled only by the wonder of their doing it. They did not seem to attract any attention, to be conscious of danger from insult, though their light gliding steps carried them past many spots of peril. Their manner, though observant, was reserved. No, through all these strange nightly jaunts, Roland never doubted Olive's motives to be innocent—their object pure as unknown, but he was lost in perplexity.

He had not yet revealed what he had seen to Olive's father. He wished first to discover more, and was sure he should, when, on the fourth night; retracing their steps precisely over the same route, the girls overtook a man, and, passing with him into one of the houses, were lost to sight. It was rather a poor lodging-house. Here they remained for over an hour.

The next evening they met and sought the same house, which they entered. Then Roland went to Mr. Sefton and revealed what he knew.

* * * * * * *

"You are sure she went this way, Roland?—down this common street—and at this late hour?"

"Quite sure."

"And went into this poor place?—is there now?"

"Yes, Mr. Sefton. Will you ring?"

Mr. Sefton rang at the door of the poor lodging-house. A shabby maid answered the summons.

"You just admitted two young ladies," he said. "Where are they?"

"No. 5, sir; Mr. Aubert's room, sir."

The door was evidently unintentionally ajar, for low voices within were earnestly talking.

"Not now, when you are sick, Victor?"

"No, not now, when I am sick, Ada. You cannot say he has ever expressed a wish for mp return."

Mr. Sefton caught his breath at the two voices.

"No, but I know father is heartbroken at your absence, Victor. He would give the world if there had been no quarrel. Dear brother, don't refuse! let me tell him you are here. Ever since Ada believed she saw you from her father's carriage, coming down this forlorn street, we have searched for you with that hope—to urge you back home. We searched and waited so long, dear! but could not give you up, while Ada was so sure you had come into one of these houses. Oh, Victor! have you not suffered enough, trying to gain a livelihood for which you have no training—almost starving—ill, now—have you not endured enough, my dear brother, to come back home and ask papa's pardon for your own heat and disrespect, forgetting his anger? If he were harsh, he loves you —" She broke down crying.

"He loves you, my son," added the father, coming into the room. "Let me ask your pardon for my—"

"No, no, father!" cried poor, pale Victor Sefton, springing from the bed; and they were all crying together—all five, I believe, but there was no uninterested observer to make record.

It was true, as Olive had said, that Victor had no training for a life of poverty. He was almost starving as a music-teacher. His first experience of the world's hardships had been bitter indeed.

Father and son had learned a lesson. At 21 and 51 years of age both had learned the same, and passion no longer dominates the Seftons. Love rules instead, and not one of the large and increasing family is more dear than the sister and daughter who brought about the reconciliation with such difficulty. Large, because while Mr. Sefton had never withheld his consent for Olive marrying Roland, he as willingly gave it for the union of Victor and brown-eyed, faithful little Ada—and the children of all rise up and call them blessed—Selected.

THE MEERSCHAUM PIPE.

Some Valuable Pointers About Its Use.

I am an incessant smoker, as all my friends know. I get tired of cigars occasionally. Not long since I concluded to try the pipe, and as I had always heard so much about a meerschaum, I bought one. When I was taking it away the salesman told me not to smoke it too much or I would burn the wax and ruin the thing. I smoked it very little for the first few weeks, and saw no indications that the thing was ever going to change. I went into the place where I bought it and told the fellow who had sold it to me about my progress, or lack of progress. He said, after I had told him how much I had smoked, that I had not smoked it enough.

I smoked it for several weeks after and saw no perceptible change. I again went in, and made a mechanical complaint. The young man said he guessed I kept it in the case too much, and that he had forgotten to warn me against that. He said it kept the pipe too warm to keep it in the case too much. Soon after I went into the place again. The man looked at it, and said that he guessed I handled it too much; that I ought not to take it out of the case too frequently, as it made splotches on it to handle it too often. Then we had a talk all around on meerschaum pipes. I found out that the meerschaum is a great pipe, and will give satisfaction if you observe the following rules:—

Don't smoke it too much;

Don't smoke it too little.

Don't take it out of the case too often.

Don't leave it in the case to much.

Don't lay it down to cool off after you have smoked it, for in that case it will crack.

Don't carry it it your pocket, for then it will not cool fast enough.

I have returned to the cigar.

A SMART BOY.

How He Saved His Employers Some Money.

There is a good story going the rounds about a man who has become a successful merchant. A few years ago he was employed as an office boy and messenger for a large firm. He was sent to collect an account from a firm which was considered very "shaky," and was told to get the money at all hazzards. The debtors gave the lad a cheque for £50. He went to the bank at once to cash it, and was told by the cashier that there were not enough funds to meet it.

"How much short?" asked the lad.

"Thirty shillings," was the answer.

It lacked but a minute or two of the time for the bank to close. The boy felt in his pockets, took out thirty shillings, and, pushing it through the window, said, "Put that to the credit of Blank & Co."

The cashier did so, whereupon the boy presented the cheque and got the money. Blank & Co., failed the next day, and their chagrin can be better imagined than described when they found out the trick that had been played upon them.

AMMONIA BAKING POWDERS MUST GO.

Baking Powder Bill Passed by the Minnesota Senate.

The recent newspaper discussion of the dangerous qualities of ammonia comes from the alarming increase of its use in baking powders. People who absorb it in small quantities from day to day suffer from slow ammonia poisoning. Taken internally in sufficient quantities it eats away the coatings of the stomach and intestines and causes death. Slow ammonia poisoning produces various forms of stomach trouble.

Not one woman in ten thousand would use an Ammonia Baking Powder if she knew it. Such Powders not only undermine the health, but Ammonia imparts a sallow and blotched complexion.

Following is the bill recently passed by the Minnesota Senate. It's the danger signal which the law throws out for the protection of the people:

A BILL FOR AN ACT TO REGULATE THE TRAFFIC IN BAKING POWDER.

Section 1.—Any person who shall knowingly sell or procure the sale, or offer for sale any package or can ot Baking Powder, containing any Ammonia in it, not distinctly, legible and durably branded, stamped or marked in a conspicuous place with the words in the English language. "This Baking Powder contains Ammonia" in letters of great pica or any letters equivalent thereto in length, shall be guilty ot a misdemeanor, and punished by a fine not less than $20 nor more than $50; shall be confined in the County Jail not less than ten or more than twenty days or by both fine and imprisonment, in the direction of the court.

Section 2.—The Sale or offer for sale of the substance mentioned in the foregoing section in packages not stamped, marked, branded or labelled as therein required, shall be primafacie evidence of knowledge of the character of said substance, on the part of the person so selling or offering for sale and his employer.

Section 3.—This Act shall be in force on and after its passage.

NOTE.—An incident occurred in the House when the Senate bill came up for passage, in reference to an amendment proposed by Mr. Diment. This was opposed by several members. Mr. Feig said that if the bill as it came from the Senate was all right then the amendment was all wrong. The amendment compelling the printing of the word "Ammonia" on the label only effected the Royal Baking Powder, and no wonder they felt the Senate bill was a blow at them.

AN UNFORTUNATE SLIP.

How a Zealous Ensign Tangled His Tongue on His Maiden Watch.

This season's crop of Annapolis graduates has been neatiy distributed about the navy, and several of the luckiest youngsters have settled in the brooklyn Navy Yard.

One of them was assigned to the Philadelphia, and one fine morning he was put on duty as officer of the deck for one of the morning watches. It was his first "active duty," and his chest expanded a full inch as he buckled on his sword and marched to the quarter deck. This was at ten o'clock, and his watch was till noon. In this trick there is but one order to be given. That comes at seven bells (half-past eleven o'clock), and is to this effect:—"Bosun's mate. Pipe sweepers."

The youngster had "boned" up on his duties carefully, and struck a suberb attitude on the bridge as the seven strokes began, clearing his throat to give the regulation nautical ring to his order. And to make him especially careful, he knew, although he could not see them, that half the ship's company were hidden away somewhere intently watching his debut.

So as the seventh bell rang out on the sultry air he sang out in a voice to be heard half way across the basin. "Bo-o-o-sun's mate!"

"Aye "aye, sir! responded that functionary, stumbling aft with his whistle in his fingers.

"Swipe peepers."

The boatswain's mate endeavored to pucker for a whistle but his lips divided in a grin that made blowing impossible, while a shout of laughter came from all along the deck.

"No, no," stammered the unfortunate ensign, "I mean 'Peep swipers.'"

The boatswain's mate nearly fell in a fit at this, and the screams of laughter from the on lookers well nigh started the cruiser from her moorings. The youngster lost his head completely at this second disaster, and it took seven men to keep him from jumping into the East River.

The whistle was finally sounded and the sweeping trick was done, but the youth had his meals brought to him in his berth all that day, and spent his month's pay the following twenty-four hours in buying the silence of his comrades.—New York Herald.

A NEWSBOY SCARECROW

How a Long Standing Tradition Was Tested by the Cabbies.

From time out of mind the newsboys has been a standing feature at the entrance to the Cortland Street Ferry, says the New York Times. He is there with the hackmen before daylight, aud untill cabby puts out his lights after the last train at midnight there is always some little chap waiting with papers to sell. In the daytime the paper vendors are numerous, but after 9 o' clock in the evening there seems to be an unwritten law by which one boy holds sole possession. The boy may change every night, but when a boy is there at that hour it is understood that he can take care of all the belated buyers, and those who may stroll along leave him the field undisputed.

The other night the hackmen put the newsboys' unwritten law to a test in an amusing way. An old coat was wrapped round one of the hitching posts near the ferry entrance, and on top a hat was placed. A stick under one arm of the coat held a paper. The post being in a shadow this rig looked from a short distance not unlike a boy with a paper under his arm. Genuine boys came down to the east side of West street, spied the patient figure across the way, and turned back. That night there were no papers for sale at the ferry, but since then—the joke being discovered the next morning—the newsboys in that neighborhood have profited by the valuable lesson that things are not always what they seem. Scarecrows fool than no more.

Drew the Line at His Shirt.

Senator Vest is considered the best poker ployer in the upper house. He nearly always wins. A while ago he was at Hot Springs, Ark., with Senatar Kenna. Society there was a little mixed, and so it happened that a very gentlemanly drummer from St. Louis made a third with them in a little game of draw. It was perfectly fair, but Vest lost all the money he had, borrowed more and saw it disappear, and finally had to give two or three notes off hand to square himself before dropping out. Thereupon he leaned back in his chair, fanning himself and enjoying the sport as a spectator. Presently the St. Louis drummer, between the hands, began making some very complimentary remarks upon a very beautiful and elaborate shirt which Vest had on. He took the liberty of feeling the texture of the garment, and, after ascertaining how much it had cost, remarked that he would like to own one himself. "Gentlemen," said Vest, rising from his chair, "I will bid you good night. You may rob me of all the money I have and all I can borrow, but I'm cussed if you can get my shirt."—Washington Star.

The Young Man Fainted.

While a young man and young lady of Abbeville, Ga., were gathering plums, the young lady stepped on the head of a black snake. Her first intimation of the situation was the presence of the snake's coil around her ankle. She shrieked and swooned. The young man flew to the rescue, but the reptile was moving slowly away when the excited youth assailed him. The snake showed fight, and striking with his full force fastened his fangs in the man's waistband. The horror of his predicament overcame him, and fainting, he in turn fell to the ground. The young lady was the first to recover, and when her beau returned to consciousness tho snake had disappeared.—Atlanta Constitution.

WHAT IS HOME WITHOUT A MOTHER

The room's in disorder,
The cat's on the table,
The flower-stand upset, and the mischief to pay!
And Johnny is screaming
As loud as he's able,
For nothing goes right when mamma's away.

What a scene of discomfort and confusion home would be if mamma did not return. If your wife is slowly breaking down, from a combination of domestic cares and female disorders, make it your first business to restore her health. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is without a peer as a remedy for feeble and debilitated women, and is the only medicine for the class of maladies known as "female diseases" which is sold, by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers that it will give satisfaction, in every case, or the money will be refunded. It is a positive cure for the most complicated cases. It's an invigorating, restorative tonic, and a soothing and strengthening nervine, imparting tone and vigor to the whole system. It's a legitimate medicine, too—carefully compounded by an experienced physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization.

Absence of Mind.

Some people find it hard, in using the telephone, to realize that they are not face to face with the person they are addressing.

A prominent merchant in the capital city of a State sat at his desk one hot day in July. In order to secure some degree of comfort he had taken off his coat and his collar and necktie.

A clerk came into the room.

"His excellency, the governor, wishes to speak with you through the telephone," said the clerk.

"The governor! Dear me!" said the merchant.

He rose, hastily put on his collar, his necktie, and his coat, gave his hair a stroke; and went to the telephone to answer the governor's call.

GERMANY'S NEW CHILD.

HELGOLAND'S MANY CHANGES OF OWNERSHIP.

The Strange Little Rocky Islet and Its People—Few Changes in Its Laws—Slowly Being Eaten Up by the Seas.

Helgoland covers an area of 420,060 square yards, and it is difficult to realize in what way it ever was a prize worth gaining. In its geological formation it differs strangely from the neighboring mainland; the whole German seaboard is bare of cliff or rock, being only a succession of long and sandy dunes slowly encroaching upon the sea, while the island is a solid mass of stone which the sea as surely is invading. The range of rocks is picturesque, of a dull red color, broken into by many grottos, fissures, chines, vaults, and arches, through which the breakers rush incessantly with a deafening noise. It can be calculated with mathematical precision how long it will take the sea entirely to swallow up the island, computing by the ravages it has already made, and it is said that in 600 years nothing will remain of the ground ceded to Germany by England. What value it has must be as a post of observation; as to its appearance it is graphically described by its own motto:

Grun ist das Land,
Roth is der Kant,
Weiss ist der Sand,
Das sind die Farben von Helgoland.

Her three colors are also in her flag, and the soil repeats them accurately.

The upper plateau is called the "Falm," and dominates the whole area, the lower portion being only a narrow line of beach. Above stands a church; the new lighthouse, an older one dating from the seventeenth century, interesting only that it has withstood the storms of 250 years; the Governor's villa, not a bad building by any means, and a few mean-looking houses. The portion of the plateau which corresponds to the green stripe in the flag is a large meadow, on which the precious island sheep graze. Helgoland rears but a very limited number of cows, and as goats cannot stand the climate, the milk of the ewes is the ordinary beverage. The "Falm" is linked to the lower part of the village by a flight of steep steps and an elevator. On the beach or seaboard the houses are small, built of wood, adorned with verandas and balconies; the extremely narrow streets boast of shops where photographs, shells and articles of national raiment are sold; there are no inns on the island, but the bills of "Logis,' hanging out of the windows of private dwelling houses indicate that board and lodging can be found therein. The whole thing looks like a quaint, new, clean toy. Queen Victoria street is the main thoroughfare, a liliputian street in a liliputian town; yet it leads to a theatre, actually a bona fide playhouse, open during the summer, where very fair performances are given under the superintendence of an intelligent manager. For, notwithstanding disadvantages, Helgoland is a favorite sea-bathing place. The visitors do not bathe on the island itself, but have to cross a strip of sea to a sand dune some ten minutes off, opposite the village, but inaccessible to open boats in rough weather.

This dune widens and broadens in proportion as the block of rock diminishes, and the air there is so admirably pure and invigorating that it is considered a perfect cure for diseased lungs and anæmia. The islanders are in the possession of excellent health; they make a good living out of the strangers during the short summer months, after which they return to their legitimate trade of fishing, their chief hauls being lobsters and herrings.

The Helgolanders were not consulted when they were handed over to their new proprietors, and probably, if quite aware of the change, are not much concerned by it; some of them thought that England neglected them too much; others fancy that the Germans will prove too officious and hamper them with police and military regulations; but on the whole they are indifferent. As long as Helgoland remained British, no foreigner being able to acquire land on the island, there could be no prospect of a hotel being built likely to interfere with the trade of the lodging-house keeper; not one of them was rich enough to make the venture; therefore the profits accruing from visitors were divided impartially between all. Now it is probable that some German speculator may be tempted to purchase ground and open a modern hotel; little steamers will be made to ply between the village and the sand dune and defraud the boatmen of their customers, and these innovations are dreaded. On the other hand, increased comforts and facilities will make the island even more popular, so that on the whole the natives will not have much to complain of.

Gain, it must be confessed, is their chief pre-occupation; they have scanty political and civil faith; originating from Friesland, they have changed hands too often to be patriotic; in turn belonging to the Normans, to the Hanse, to the Duke of Gottorp, and to Denmark, they became English in 1806, and their island was used to send British produce on the continent during the time of the blockade.

It has been said that the little community paid no taxes, but this is incorrect; under the British rule the inhabitants were taxed according to the size of their dwellings and the possibility of receiving more or less visitors. Under the new rule every Helgolander born at the time of the transfer is ipso facto exempted from military service, and with so long an immunity before them they can afford to look upon future contingencies with equanimity. Formerly Helgoland was a sort of Gretna Green and many irregular matches were contracted on its shores; even at present the laws are by no means vexatious; and as a rule the people live in happy ignorance of them; they know vaguely that they possess a code of thirteen articles, but the magistrates are good natured men who deliver justice according to "equity" and do not bother about legal quibbles. In the sessions recently held on the island not a single case was brought before the tribunal. Evidently the Normans, the most litigious people on earth, have not left their stamp on the race.N, Y. Sun.

A Perfect Baking Powder.

The constantly growing demand for Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, the standard cream tartar powder for forty years, is due to two causes.

FIRST:—The extreme care exercised by the manufacturers to make it perfectly pure, uniform in quality, and of highest raising power.

SECOND:—The recent investigations exposing the fact that certain other brands of baking powder contain ammonia and still others that were found to contain alum. These unscrupulous manufacturers are being found out, and the consumers are giving them a wide birth.

Nothing is left to chance in the manufacture of Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder. Chemists are employed to test every ingredient as to purity and strength. Hence; its marvelous purity and uniformity. Each can is like every other. It never dissapoints. BEST is ALWAYS the CHEAPEST.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from Ammonia, Alum, or any other adulterant. In fact, the purity of this ideal powder has never been questioned.

FARM, FIELD AND GARDEN

SUBJECTS OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO THE FARMER.

Partial Soiling--Experiments in Keeping Eggs--Horseradish Culture--Kindness to Cows--Creamery Requisites--The Soil Inexhaustible.

Partial Soiling.

In many cases the cutting of green feed and giving to the stock can be done to advantage. The western farmer, with cheap lands and consequently cheap pasturage, would not care to follow this plan with all of his stock, as the large amount of work necessary, would, in very many cases, make the work unprofitable. But at the same time many contingencies will arise that a few stock can be fed this way to an advantage. When the work teams are kept busy it is not always the best plan to turn them into a large pasture and let them run all night. They need rest and they will be benefited by a feed of something fresh and green, and the best way of supplying it is by cutting off the grass and feeding to stock in the stables. Hogs that are confined in close pens can always be fed green clover cut every day. Milk cows, even when they have the run of the pastures with other cattle during the day, will give more and richer milk if they are fed grass or clover to themselves at night.

The work teams and the milk cows need a little better feeding during the summer than the growing cattle or horses, and in a majority of cases the most economical plan of furnishing it is to have a patch of clover, rye or grass and cutting and feeding every day. Millet, sweet corn or sorghum, or the second growth of clover, can be used through the summer. It will be best to grow such crops for this purpose as can be cut cured and stored away for use later, if not needed when matured sufficiently to harvest. Such crops should be grown convenient to the stables or feeding lots so as to lessen the work in feeding.

In many cases a patch that can be used in this way for all the stock will be found of considerable advantage during the latter part of summer when it so often occurs that the pastures fail to supply plenty of feed. But with the teams and milch cows more or less can be turned to an advantage the greater part of the growing season.—N. J. S., in Prairie Farmer.

Experiments in Keeping Eggs.

At the New York State Agricultural Experiment Station a few of the methods of packing eggs dry for keeping were tested in 1890. The eggs were all wiped when fresh with a rag saturated with fat or oil, in which had been mixed some antiseptic, and packed tightly in salt, bran, etc. Eggs packed during April and May, in salt, which had been wiped in cottonseed oil, to which had been added boracic acid, kept from four to five months, with a loss of nearly one-third, the quality of those saved not being good. Eggs packed after the same preliminary handling in bran were all spoiled after four months.

Better success was had with eggs packed in salt during March and April, after wiping with vaseline, to which salicylic acid had been added. These kept four or five months without loss, and the quality after four months was much superior to that of ordinary limed eggs.

The eggs, in all these trials, were kept in a barn cellar, the ordinary temperature of which varied from 60 to 70 degrees Fahrenheit, and each box was turned once every two days.

Little difference was observed in the keeping of the fertile and the infertile eggs, and no difference was noticeable in the keeping qualities of eggs from different fowls or from those under different rations.

The Soil Inexhaustible.

Some speculative philosophers have of late years, predicted that the time will come when the soil of the world will be exhausted and the human race gradually become extinct on our planet for want of food—be "starved out," as it were—but the American Agriculturist does not take readily to this melancholy view of the case. It says:

"One foot in depth of a fairly good agricultural soil contains 4,000 pounds of phosphoric acid; 8,000 pounds of potash; 16,000 pounds of nitrogen and lime, magnesia, soda, chlorine, sulphur and silica to afford food for all the crops which these three elements can feed per acre. After farmers, by careful and skilled cultivation have exhausted all this great store of plant food in the uppermost foot of this soil, which will require several centuries, will the soil be exhausted? Not at all. As the land is gradually changed into vegetable growth, and the surface is removed as farm crops, as it gradually deepens, the subsoil which contains the very same elements becomes fitted for plant food. And this the imperishable nature of matter applies to the soil, which can never be exhausted during all the ages that are to come. All that mankind has to do is to use its arts, under the instruction of science to develop this latent fertility of the soil, and to go on feeding the human race until the end, if an end ever shall come, when the earth will no longer exist as a fit habitation for mankind."

Horseradish Culture.

There is no condiment more highly esteemed in this country than horseradish. Taken in moderate quantities, as a condiment, it is not only agreeable to the palate but wholesome. It is also said to be, when prepared with lemon juice an excellent assuager of pain in some forms of rheumatism; but for that purpose it must never be eaten with vinegar, which is poisn to the rheumatic patient. The raw root, moreover, chewed a short time before making a public address will enable a speaker troubled with hoarsness to fulfill his task with ease. The use of this root is rapidly extending, and as its cultivation is exceedingly easy it is a profitable crop to grow.

A few practical hints on the best method of cultivating it are given by a correspondent of the American Cultivator, who says that the soil for its cultivation should be deep, mellow and very rich, so that the roots will be able to reach a good size. The land should be thrown into ridges several feet apart, after being raked smooth, and the sets placed in the hollow made by a wheel marker. These sets are about an inch in length, and they can be obtained from any old bed or purchased from market gardeners. They should not be too large or they will branch and send up innumerable roots to sap away the strength of the stalk.

The sets should be planted out in May or June, and covered only about an inch with the soil. Catch crops of beets, lettuce and spinach can be planted along with the horse-radish, which can be gathered up before the horse-radish has made much headway.

The roots can be left in the ground until spring, as they are quite hardy and not much affected by the frost; but if dug in the fall and kept in pits through the winter the flavor and appearance will be better.

Creamery Requisites.

The creamery itself may be described as a square building 30 by 30 feet, with engine house adjoining; the wash room floor and office are on the ground level, while the work room and store are sunk in the ground about four feet, and are cement lined throughout. The apparatus consists of an equipment of Cooley cans without taps for submerging in ice water, two Boyd tempering vats, one heating vat, 1,300 gallon churn and one Mason power worker. Power is conveyed to this flat from a six horse power horizontal engine supplied with steam power from an engine horse power boiler.

Our butter which quickly found a front place, is put up in packages ranging from two pounds to fifty pounds, while a small proportion is made into one pound prints and sold from refrigerator boxes. From our experience, and taking into consideration the general conditions throughout the province, I feel that at present it is not practicable to establish many profitable creameries, but with her rich natural pasture and other favorable features Manitoba should make a grand showing in the dairy line during the next decade. Let us persuade our neighbors to superannuate the flat pan and the dash churn, grow more fodder corn and roots, fill up the chinks in the draughty cow house, use good dairy salt and pack in new neat tubs.—E. A. Struthers, Manager Barnardo Industrial Farm.

Kindness to Cows.

When I see a man go among his cows and they every one edge away from him, I know there is "music" in his stable at milking time. But when I see a man going through his herd in the pasture and he has to walk around his cows in order to make progress, I know that peace and quietness reign when the cows come home. And, after all, the Jersey cow is peculiarly sensitive to ill treatment, more so than a cow of any other breed, I believe, and Jerseymen, as a rule, treat their cows gently; it is seldom that you see a wild Jersey cow. And the Jersey bulls wouldn't have the reputation they bear if they were handled as gently as the cows are, but it is a dangerous business petting a bull unless he is safely anchored.

What a difference a change of milkers makes! Every alternative Sunday my regular milker is away and another man does the milking, one who used to be the regular milker, but the change causes the loss of one pound of butter at the next semi-weekly charning.—A. L. Crosby.

Where parents should send their sons to college next year is a question it is about time to decide. Many things must be considered, economy is a very important one, there is a great difference among colleges in this respect. We know of one college (Macalaster, between the twin cities) where several students boarded themselves on $1.-25 a week and lived well. They were among the best students in the college. This is mighty cheap and Macalaster is a fine institution.

"German Syrup"

A Cough and Croup Medicine.

For children a medicine should be absolutely reliable. A mother must be able to pin her faith to it as to her Bible. It must contain nothing violent, uncertain, or dangerous. It must be standard in material and manufacture. It must be plain and simple to administer; easy and pleasant to take. The child must like it. It must be prompt in action, giving immediate relief, as childrens' troubles come quick, grow fast, and end fatally or otherwise in a very short time. It must not only relieve quick but bring them around quick, as children chafe and fret and spoil their constitutions under long confinement. It must do its work in moderate doses. A large quantity of medicine in a child is not desirable. It must not interfere with the child's spirits, appetite or general health. These things suit old as well as young folks, and make Boschee's German Syrup the favorite family medicine. ①

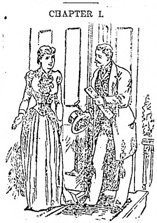
ANNE BISSELL.

By AUGUSTA LARNED.

CHAPTER I.



"Come right in, doctor."

Mrs. Bissell's cottage windows stood wide open, and the Nottingham lace curtains flew out of the south room, where the scent of the damask roses and old fashioned pinks arose in warm puffs from the pretty garden. Mrs. Bissell, a checked handkerchief pinned over her head, was briskly sweeping the ingrain carpet with a quick, short motion of the broom; the narrow hall was incumbered with chairs and tables, and a horsehair sofa blocked the front door. The honeysuckle vine above the porch was thickly hung with blossoms, and piazza chairs with scarlet cushions were set out in the shade, with the inviting air of summer repose. A door through into the back regions was also open, and a delicious odor of baking bread came from the kitchen. From the dining room arose a slight clatter of dishes, the sound of clearing away after breakfast, the trip of girlish feet, and a pleasant young voice humming a tune.

"Anne," shrilled Mrs. Bissell from the south room, "look out for the bread in the oven and see that it don't get a scorch."

"We must make haste," responded Anne from the dining room, still invisible, "or he will be here before the room is ready."

"Ain't I making haste?" piped Mrs. Bissell, also invisible, on her side and with a touch of asperity in her voice. A woman of Mrs. Bissell's active temperament never likes to be hurried, especially by her own daughter, an inexperienced slip of a girl, with no proper idea of turning off work. "I guess it won't hurt him to wait a few minutes if his room ain't ready," she added, making her broom fly at a more rapid rate.

"I didn't say it would," retorted Anne on her side, just interrupting a snatch of song on her lips, as she put the blue edged plates on the cupboard shelf.

Miss Carver's room door was also open just at the head of the stairs. She had heard every word that passed between Anne and her mother, for the little house was like a sounding board, and Miss Carver could absorb its sounds without making the slightest effort to listen. It occurred to her now, as it often did, that Anne was rather impertinent to her mother. Miss Carver gave a little impatient sigh over the degeneracy of modern youth. She was one of the old inhabitants of Littlefield, born and brought up there, knowing every family history from time immemorial, every mote in a neighbor's eye, all the town affairs, to the probable amount of change that people carried about in their purses. People consulted her about the past as they would go to a gazetteer or town history, and the present poured itself into her ears.

She had boarded many years with Mrs. Bissell, so exactly calculating her expenditures that they came out to within fifty cents of her income every 1st of January. She invariably allowed for a month of visits to old friends during the twelve, and if she was invited for only three weeks it involved a little extra pinching, and if for five or six weeks corresponding financial ease. Miss Carver had a little industry by which she occasionally earned a trifle. She made paper flowers and sold them for the adornment of Christmas trees, children's festivals and church fairs. It was easy work of a clean kind, such as a gentlewoman could do whose father had been high sheriff of the county without detracting from her social position in Littlefield. She called herself an artist in flower work, and on this particular morning she had arranged her little table with bright tissue paper, fine wire, scissors and glue pot, but it was impossible for Miss Carver to settle to anything. She sat by the window, and through her spectacles spied the coming of the new boarder, gazing out under the great elm trees that shaded the brown road in front of the Bissell cottage.

It was not a matter of small importance to Miss Carver that a new doctor was coming to Littlefield. The old doctor, whose place he was taking, had been a great friend of Miss Carver and of her family, when she had a family, for now she was all alone in the world, with no kin nearer than second cousins. The Bissell cottage, a boarding house of the cheapest and humblest sort, gained a kind of importance from the fact that the new doctor was to establish himself there for the first experimental months of his stay in Littlefield. Miss Carver felt this added importance as a slight increase of her own individual respectability. She would no longer feel obliged to excuse herself for living at Mrs. Bissell's by the fact that she liked the air of that end of the town, leaving it to be inferred that she could if she chose live at the Oak Hill hotel or any of the more fashionable places.

She had talked the young doctor over at many tea tables. In her set he had almost supplanted Mrs. Bissell and her lapses in management, the inefficiency of Bissell, and the independent, slightly insouciant air assumed by Anne in the household.

[illegible] tron- [illegible] belonged [illegible] school. She had [illegible] stanch in her orthodox medical views. A doctor in the house would certainly be a convenience, for Miss Carver had her pet infirmities, and she regretted the expensive luxury of talking them over with a regular practitioner. But a doctor in the house, whom one met familiarly at meals, would hardly estimate his professional talk as highly as Dr. Leavitt did. She would doubtless be able to pick up a good deal that might be useful to her gratis. But, alas! he was of the wrong school. She could not in all conscience ever bring herself to take those absurd little pills, even if they were given away.

Miss Carver had been going over these questions in her mind when a station hack drew up to the front gate and a young man of fair complexion, "well set up" as our English cousins say, and decidedly good looking, stepped out and banged the hack door. He had no luggage, and had in his hand a little sign inscribed with the words "Dr. S. L. Tibbets." Miss Carver flew out to the passage and called down, "He's come, Mrs. Bissell!" in a hysterical voice.

The horsehair sofa still blocked the hall, and a large easy chair filled the front door. "Mercy! what shall I do?" exclaimed Mrs. Bissell. Anne rushed out from the dining room letting down the sleeves of her pink morning dress and with a pretty blush on her fair face.

"Come right in, doctor," Miss Carver heard her say. "Mother is a little belated about your office; but step into the parlor if you can manage to climb over these things."

The doctor replied in an easy, good natured, languid voice, and Miss Carver thought to herself in her New England fashion of weighing and measuring, "He hasn't got much force." The doctor was telling Anne that his luggage had been left by mistake at the junction where he had taken the Appledale branch line, and would not arrive for some hours. He had therefore appeared with only his doctor's sign in his hand as proof of identity. The young people went into the parlor, and in a few moments Miss Carver heard sounds of laughter, the doctor's easy voice and Anne's girlish staccato notes.

"What confidence the girl has," thought Miss Carver, "to be going on like that the very first minute! I should think her mother would try and check her; it looks so flirtatious." The risk that poor, unsuspecting young man incurred in coming into the Bissell family filled her with a kind of pity. She was glad Providence had so arranged things that at her age she did not find any forward, pert girls on her hands to manage. Surely the single state has its advantages. It at least affords one a lofty pedestal for criticising one's neighbors. Miss Carver could see in many ways how Mrs. Bissell had missed it, and how differently she would have done in her place.

There was an old Grandfather Bissell, a stone deaf old man, who sat in the kitchen in a rocking chair close to the stove, with his hat on even in warm weather. Sometimes he worked a little in the garden, or pottered about on errands in the town, or assisted at the cooking when a crisis occurred in the domestic arrangements, as often happened. But in a general way he was of no use—only another mouth to feed. The old man had married daughters far better off than Mrs. Bissell, who refused to keep him on the ground that he was hard to get along with, though apparently a more harmless old soul did not live. Miss Carver was strenuous on the fact of Gran'ther Bissell. If she could have had her way the old man would have been sent packing, and the hard hearted daughters brought to terms.

Then there was Bissell himself, part carpenter and part teamster; but both teaming and carpentry were now at a low ebb in Littlefield, and as there was nothing for Bissell to do he did nothing, and let his wife support him. The sight of Bissell hanging about the place when there was a mortgage on the property filled Miss Carver with suppressed rage. If Bissell was her husband she knew she would find some way of making him earn his salt. She dared not hint of her feelings to Mrs. Bissell, for the little woman was very touchy and truculent about her "men folks." She said she "guessed she had a right to keep as many men folks as she pleased, and the neighbors might just stop talking. They sat back in their easy chairs doing fancy work and crochet, and saw her digging away for dear life, and could find nothing better to gossip about than her ways of managing her affairs. They had better look to the beam in their own eyes."

CHAPTER II.

The dinner was late that day, and the meal had the air of being scrambled together, which sometimes happens in the best regulated boarding houses. Things had "hitched" early in the morning, and poor Mrs. Bissell had striven in vain to catch up with her work. She did not appear at the dinner table, for her Irish maid, Bridget, seemed to have completely lost her head, and the kitchen was upside down. Mrs. Bissell dished up the food, and the old man carried the platters and vegetable dishes to the dining room door, where Anne received them. You could hear the scuffling of his old feet as he went to and fro in the passage. Mrs. Bissell's other boarders, the Holmes family, had been waiting round hungry for half an hour. They were slow, silent people, even to the little boy and girl, who, with hair "slicked" down close to their cheekbones, the upward turn of the eyes and rather flat noses, had a Mongolian cast of countenance. When the bell rang Miss Carver came in with that irritated pinch of the thin lips they always wore when dinner was late. But as Mrs. Bissell kept her for a dollar a week less than any of her other boarders the privilege of open complaint was taken away.

The young doctor occupied the head of the table, and Anne filled her mother's place with easy assurance, as if nothing ever went wrong in the Bissell establishment. It was a shame, Miss Carver thought, for Anne to look as cool and unruffled as ice cream while her mother was stewing over the kitchen fire. And then she was so undeniably, so exasperatingly pretty. Her auburn hair—people called red hair red when Miss Carver was young—rippled in a mass across her white forehead and down the slope of her round neck, and was gathered in a great fluffy, curly nest at the back, just defining itself in loose coils. The pale pink of her gown suited well with her dazzling complexion and dark hazel eyes, dancing in the light of innocent mischief. She talked all the time, as if the light flow of her girlish chatter could cover up the deficiencies of the table service and the irregularity with which the courses came in. Miss Carver, intrenched in aggressive silence, felt that Anne was a sham and wondered how far she would succeed in pulling the wool over the young doctor's eyes.

But the doctor had no starch about him. He seemed to find some amusement in the difficulties of the situation. He made himself thoroughly at home and told so many funny stories about a healthy old town where he had tried to establish himself, and had been starved out for lack of patients, that Miss Carver found herself laughing until the tears came under her glasses. The Holmes children were grinning from ear to ear and stretching their lipless mouths like india rubber bands over the doctor's funny stories. The table grew so merry that tired Mrs. Bissell in the kitchen stopped to listen, while the old man, putting his brown, crooked hand up to his good ear, did likewise.

"He'll be popular," said Miss Carver to herself as she went slowly up stairs. "He'll make friends as easy as water runs down hill. Father always said we must distrust easy popularity. I do hope he'll see through Anne Bissell. If her mother had any judgment with the girl she wouldn't let her throw herself at that man's head."

Miss Carver spent most of the afternoon spying out of the window to see the doctor's office furniture come—heavy mahogany and rosewood, all the best and handsomest; desks, chairs, cabinets and pictures, implying the cultivated and rather luxurious tastes of a young man of pretty good length of purse.

Miss Carver opened her eyes when she remembered the depths of poverty to which he had declared himself reduced by the unnatural healthfulness of Kettletas. Guess he's extravagant, she thought to herself, as she tied on her bonnet at nightfall to go and call on her particular friend, the Widow Harkaway, and, though the widow was deaf of one ear and partly blind, before the next night the whole of Littlefield knew that young Dr. Tibbets was a humorist; that he had been frozen out of Kettletas by the longevity of the people, and had come to Littlefield without any visible means, but with a large amount of handsome office furniture, and that Anne Bissell—well, it is easy to conjecture what was whispered about Anne Bissell.

The office was all in apple pie order when Miss Carver reached home at tea time. The office door stood open, and there was the doctor with his coat off arranging his medical cabinets and whistling softly to himself. Mrs. Bissell had put new muslin curtains to the windows, and Anne had filled a vase with moss roses for the center table—those precious roses she cherished like gold—an attention Miss Carver never had received in all the years she had lived in Mrs. Bissell's house.

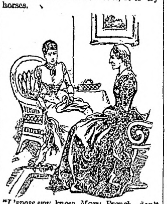
"The sun is going to rise and set on his head," thought Miss Carver as she took her way up to her room, smelling the tea biscuits from the open kitchen door. But she could not hate the young doctor. There was something engaging about the creature, she acknowledged inwardly, as she laid off her things.

Dr. Tibbets certainly was a cheery soul, and he seemed to infuse a breezy life and temper into the rather distracted Bissell menage. Mrs. Bissell felt her work lighter, and Anne seemed to take a new interest in home and to talk less about the dullness of Littlefield. Some people pitied Anne and felt that she occupied a false position. She had been graduated at the normal school, and had taught a year or two in a country town, but it was beside all the traditions of the Littlefieldians to take a mechanic's daughter, whose mother kept a cheap boarding house, into the best set. She was prettier than most of the daughters of the wealthy old families, but Anne's beauty did not seem an advantage in the eyes of the Littlefield dowagers, and her independent, free ways appeared rather lacking in reverence to the pure Littlefield blue blood, whose pretensions Anne did not hesitate to laugh at in Miss Carver's presence.

CHAPTER III.

In a few days the whole Bissell family was revolving around the young doctor. He had a fine tenor voice, and in the interval of waiting for patients the neighbors could hear Anne accompanying him on the old cracked piano. The chances of his working up a practice in Littlefield were taken to heart by every member of the household. Even the Holmeses manifested a kind of batrachian interest in the affair. The doctor whimsically lamented the ill luck that had brought him to a town apparently as fatally healthy as Kettletas. Mrs. Bissell encouraged him to wait till the season of coughs and colds and influenza set in in the fall. Even Miss Carver believed he must succeed. No one with the doctor's face and air and powers of amusing when he laid himself out could fail to become popular in Littlefield. She had a profound distrust of popularity, never having been able to win the precious boon, but the glamor cast by the young doctor was not to be altogether resisted, even by so perspicacious and cool headed a person as Miss Carver.

Mean time, while waiting for patients, the doctor had nothing to do but read in his pretty office, where Anne daily made a new arrangement of flowers—a great bowl of water lilies or nasturtiums or sweet peas all one color, for Anne had a light, artistic hand—or to stroll about in his slippers in the garden, where Gran'ther Bissell pottered among his tomato vines and flower beds, or to try horses.



"I 'spose you know Mary French, don't you, Anne?"

All sorts of horses were brought by dealers to the door for the doctor to try, and it became the principal amusement of the neighbors to see the doctor speeding them up and down the shady street. The Bissell household came out to inspect each new aspirant for the doctor's favor. It was Mrs. Bissell's opinion that the doctor would need a long winded horse and a good goer for the flourishing practice she anticipated for him through Drayton Spurrs and Deadman's Hollow and many outlying places, where there were believers in the little pill theory who would yet rise up and call him blessed.

The scattering calls the doctor received in those first weeks made the whole house palpitate with sympathetic excitement. If the sharp, snappy little door bell rang at meal time they all started and looked at the young man at the head of the table. A slow, collective smile expanded on the composite countenance of the Holmes family. Even old Gran'ther Bissell, deaf as he was, heard it in the kitchen, and Mrs. Bissell glowed as she busied herself dishing up the vegetables Bridget was to carry into the dining room, and, if possible, Anne was rosier than her wont. There was no end of joking at the table about the good eight hours of sleep the doctor enjoyed nightly.

"I sha'n't feel at all satisfied," said Anne, beaming on him across the board, "until our bell wire is broken three or four times a week by country boys riding wild colts bareback to summon the doctor in hot haste for some old woman with the toothache."

"If you expect me to do the repairing it may cost more than I get in fees."

"Oh, I guess we can afford a few repairs," retorted Anne, "for the glory of the thing. We expect our doctor to have the biggest practice of anybody in town."

"Our doctor!" Miss Carver repeated the words with her mouth pursed up in a pucker of disapproval that afternoon, as she sat with her friend, the Widow Harkaway, cooling off after her walk, with her bonnet strings untied. "You'd think to hear them talk they had preempted him and were dividing him up into quarter sections for their own exclusive use."

There were moments when Miss Carver had "slumped" through in her original grim determination to suspect the doctor of possessing showy but untrustworthy qualities. She was like one of those "sugar" days in early spring that thaw at noon and freeze overnight—just now it was frosty weather.

The Widow Harkaway was often in so sensitive a state of mind about the goings on of her neighbors, and the wicked of the world in general, that she felt forced to sit with her eyes shut. Now her eyes were sealed, and the lids quivered with reprobation.

"I did think of calling him in for my lumbago," she began in a disparaging tone of voice, "but I have to conclude from what I have heard that he is a very reprehensible person. It has leaked out through Mary French that he is engaged to one of her schoolmates at Smith college, has been engaged a year or more, and now he has crep' in here at Littlefield and kep' it all hushed up and gone to flirting hammer and tongs with Anne Bissell."

"Engaged!" whistled Miss Carver through the gap made by the loss of one of her incisors, which the dentist's art had not yet repaired. "Well, I never! And he's been sailing along under false colors, hiding it away as if it was something to be ashamed of. I guess Anne will feel as if she had took hold of a live electric wire when she hears this news."

"You'll feel it your duty to let her know, Susan," and the Widow Harkaway opened her little cat's eyes and fixed them on her friend.

"What would you do if you were in my place, Ruth?"

"Oh, I sha'n't interfere, Susan," responded Mrs. Harkaway in her deep guttural; "I would not deprive you of the pleasure."

"You seem to imply that I am a gossipy person, Ruth, and the Lord knows if there's anything I hate it's gossip."

"I don't imply anything," returned Mrs. Harkaway sturdily. "I always go on facts."

The two friends often had little tiffs owing to the douches of free speech the widow would insist on pouring out on Miss Carver's head for her soul's good. Now she went out with a little red spot burning high up on either cheek.

Anne Bissell was in the little parlor, which, though cheaply and plainly furnished, had that harmony of color and artistic touch Anne imparted to everything with which she had to do. Her girlish brightness and bloom seemed to pervade the place and transform it into a low toned background for her beauty. She was busy sewing on a pale blue gown of some thin woolen stuff, puffing the big sleeves, and putting in white lace at the throat. Miss Carver in her scant autumnal russet slipped into the rocking chair and wiped the perspiration from her thin face. Anne's abundant loveliness wounded her as usual, and gave her the feeling that she would like to stick a pin into that pink and white complacency and call forth a little cry of pain.

"I s'pose you know Mary French, don't you, Anne?" she began, making the rockers of her chair creak.

"No, I can't say I do. We used to play together when we went to school, but she doesn't remember me now. She wouldn't call on people in our position."

"I hate to hear folks talk as if they were getting soured by being poor. Poor folks can go among the best people in Littlefield if they are of the right stamp. I am poor, and I am not ashamed to own it; but never a door is shut on me."

"Oh, we could not pretend to your superior qualifications for Littlefield society," and Anne gave her pretty head a slight toss.

The hussy! Miss Carver wanted to shake her. She hardened her heart.

"Well, Anne, I understand that Mary French knows something rather startling about your doctor," laying malignant emphasis on the "your." "He is engaged to one of her schoolmates at Smith college, and has been for a year."

She waited to see the bomb explode, but Anne lifted her face from the sleeve she was puffing serene as a summer day. "Oh, that's an old story," said she, smiling sweetly on Miss Carver. "The engagement was broken more than six months ago. The young lady insisted on the doctor's joining her church. As he declined she broke with him."

"It looks very bad to be making and breaking engagements," remarked Miss Carver with asperity. "Off with the old love and on with the new."

"Yes, it does look bad," remarked the placid Anne, "to those who have never been engaged, and are never likely to be, and do not know the difficulties of the situation."

Miss Carver sat back in her chair, breathing hard, and just then Mrs. Bissell came into the room, sat down and smoothed her apron. There was what Anne called the "black rust" in her little mother's forehead, and she heaved a sigh.

"Gran'ther is sick, Anne; something like a chill, and I've put him to bed and tucked him in warm, and now I'm waiting for the doctor. The roof leaks close to gran'ther's bed, and it has begun to rain and is so damp. I don't know but I shall move gran'ther down into my room. I had Fraser's assistant here day before yesterday to mend the roof. He said he was a stranger in town, and he has made a miserable job of it. I believe it leaks worse than ever, and I wonder Fraser would employ such a hand. I do wish the doctor would come."

Miss Carver had passed rather a trying day, and she went to bed early and slept lightly, waking every now and then from a bad dream. Late in the evening she heard Dr. Tibbet's light step going up to his patient in the attic and his pleasant, reassuring voice saying to Mrs. Bissell in the hall: "Now, don't you worry. The old man has got a little cold and a touch of fever, but we shall bring him round in a day or two."

It was astonishing to Miss Carver that Mrs. Bissell, with all the load she had to carry, should worry about that old man for whom she cooked and washed and mended when his own well to do daughters had practically cast him off. In the middle of the night she heard the front door bell ring out in the silent house with startling reverberation. She was hesitating about getting up to call Mrs. Bissell when Anne came tripping out of her room in her striped flannel dressing gown, her hair a mass of fluffy curls. Miss Carver heard her tap at the doctor's door. "The night patients have begun to pour in," she whispered through the panel, "and I'm so glad."

The doctor got up and dressed hurriedly, and then drove away in a wagon that was waiting for him at the door over the soft, wet road. Miss Carver did not hear him come in, but she found him fresh and bright in the morning at the breakfast table discussing Mrs. Bissell's rolls and coffee. Mrs. Bissell was herself seated behind the tray.

"Doctor," she asked, "was your patient very ill last night?"

"No, nothing serious; only a light touch of croup. If the mother had known how to use a little sweet oil it would have saved the trouble of sending for me. But those Irish mothers soon go off their heads when there is anything the matter with the baby. The father's name is Doyle and they live in Cork."

"Doyle," repeated Mrs. Bissell, "that must be the man who mended my roof the other day, or rather didn't mend it. It lets in the water worse than ever."

"I dare say it's the same man," returned the doctor. "He told me he was a roofer, and I think he said a plumber."

"And a miserably poor workman," returned Mrs. Bissell. "Fraser will have to send another man to mend that roof before I pay him a cent. But, by the way, doctor, I hope you got your fee."

"Yes, he paid promptly on the spot. I was rather surprised, because the place looked poor and dirty, and I thought Doyle's breath smelled as if he had been drinking."

CHAPTER IV.

Gran'ther Bissell was again pottering about the garden, and the doctor and Anne were trying over a new song in the parlor, where Anne had put down her dusting brush to play the accompaniment. Neither of them minded the broken key nor the horrible dissonance it made when they got into the full musical flow. Presently Mrs. Bissell came down from the attic chamber where the old man slept. She clung to the baluster to steady herself and keep from falling, and tottered into the little parlor as pale as ashes. The doctor turned round and caught her by the arm just in time to save her from falling. He put her gently on the sofa. "What is the matter, Mrs. Bissell?" he asked: "are you ill?"

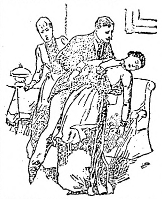
"No," gasped Mrs. Bissell, "it isn't a faint or anything that I have eaten that has disagreed. Anne, my child, I've been robbed of my interest money, all my hard earnings and savings of a year, to meet the payment on the mortgage," and a hard sob broke through the words that seemed to rend her throat.



The doctor turned around and caught her just in time to save her from falling.

There was a slight rustle at the other end of the room, and Anne looked around and saw Miss Carver standing in the door with her street things on. "What did I tell you, Miss Bissell?" she put in, quite uninvited. "Didn't I warn you it was unsafe to keep any large sum of money in the house? Didn't I plead with you as a friend to go and open an account, and deposit your money in the bank?"

"Yes; you did," returned Mrs. Bissell feebly through her fast dropping tears, "but what's the use of bringing it up now? I distrusted banks after so many savings institutions had broken. I thought it better to keep the money by me."

"Don't mind the old cat," whispered Anne, with her rosy lips close to her mother's ear, and her strong, young arms about the little woman's waist. "Tell us where the money was when it was stolen; perhaps we shall find it is all a mistake."

Mrs. Bissell brushed away a few salt drops with the corner of her checkered apron.

"You know, Anne, how careful I've always been to lock up money. It was in the middle drawer of the bureau up in gran'ther's room, left hand corner, shoved behind a pile of clothes and my winter bonnet. It was in a little shell casket that belonged to mother. I always kep' that drawer locked, but I must have gone there in a hurry and forgot to turn the key. It was a week ago yesterday, I think, when I went up to make change to pay the butcher's bill, and there was angel cake baking in the oven and I was in a great taking for fear it would burn. It must have been at that time, but I don't know, for my head isn't just straight and I can't think."

"That's the way you keep your money," sneered Miss Carver, but nobody minded her.

"You'll get it back, mother," said Anne very positively, patting the thin, whithered cheek. "Do you think it could have been Bridget?" she added in a reluctant whisper.

"I am sure of it, Anne," and Mrs. Bissell straightened up and looked about her with confidence. "Nobody else knew I kept my money there. Nobody else goes into that room except gran'ther. Of course it was Bridget, and it accounts for her strange actions this last ten days. She has slammed the stove covers and banged the kitchen utensils when I have

Miss Katie Stuhr returned last Saturday from a two weeks' visit to her parental home at Euclid.

Work on the new schoolhouse continues and will be pushed rapidly.

F. E. Hunt returned from the twin cities yesterday morning.

Parties who have been through the county say that never did crops present as grand an appearance.

Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Walsh were in town Friday, guests of Mrs. F. E. Hunt. Mr. Walsh is one of Crookston's best men and of course is head over heels in the scheme to procure the Duluth & Winnipeg—by bonding the people for $220,000.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Munch. Mr. W. C. Kelsey, wife and mother, Miss Dora, Master Willie and Carl Munch were in town Tuesday calling on old friends.

The year and a half old son of Frank Violet of Gentilly was buried Saturday. Some time ago the child swallowed a pea and has not been well since. Recently, however, the trouble seemed to be abating and the parents thought he had tided over the ill effects of pea swallowing. Friday, while drinking cold water, he was seized with a fit of coughing and chocking, and strangled to death before the eyes of his helpless parents. It is probable the button, becoming detached, lodged in his windpipe. If he had succeeded in throwing it off, he would have regained his health. The afflicted parents have the sympathy of all.

Misses Sadie and Laura Hemphill, sisters of Mrs. Frank E. Hunt, will arrive from Philadelphia, Pa., about the 21st of Aufiust on a two month visit. These young ladies have not been here for about eight years.

Frank Hunt says he saw several former Red Lake Falls citizens at Minneapolis. Johnnie Thompson has a good position as stenographer. Jamie Wyer is at home visiting. C. C. Jackson is doing well financially. Mr. Hunt says that squib in the Globe was a fake. That he didn't see a Globe reporter, didn't talk politics and has no idea how it got into the paper.

Miss Victoria La Freniere closed her term of school Friday last with an exhibition. She will begin another term the 2d of August.

Miss Victoria La Freniere visited with Ovide Moreau of Terrebonne several days, returning yesterday a. m.

Crecentia Fritz, one of the aged twin sisters of St. Cloud, 90 years old, died Suddenly Tuesday morning.

Mrs. J. J. Breen is over from Grand Forks visiting relatives.

W. A. Schreiter expects his family Saturday morning and is consequently happy.

Albert Brasseau was over from Gentilly Monday.

Miss Katie McNerthney will attend the Normal at Moorhead this winter.

Mrs. Jas. Meehan Jr. has been quite ill this week.

Miss Minnie Zaiser, our popular music teacher, will give her musicale at Fertile Friday evening. It is expected there will be a large attendance from this place, and a reduced rate will be had if twenty or more go. The quartette from here will be Mrs. J. D. Marshall, soprano, Miss Minnie Zaiser, alto, Phil. A. Kaufer, tenore and H. H. Zaiser, bass. A dance will be held after the entertainment, and those attending from here are planning for a jolly time.

The engagement of Mr. L. A. Kaufer and Miss Mollie Duffy has been announced, and the marriage will take place some time in August. The bachelor fraternity of which L. A. has been a staunch member will be loth to lose him but both he and Miss Duffy, who is one of Red Lake Falls' farest daughters, will continue to hold the best wishes of their many friends.

A dance in the Holtzknecht building Saturday night was largely attended. The report indicates a jolly time.

Rev. Fr. Arpin will conduct service at St. Marry's church Sunday at 9 a. m.

It is reported that scarlet fever is prevalent at Warren. Marshall Co.

Miss Minnie Zaiser went to Fertile last night.

Mrs. John Duffy returned yesterday from Galesburg where she had been visiting her parents.

Mrs. August Riechel Jr. and Chileren took the train for Keystone Monday morning where they will remain during the summer.

The St. Paul Globe, speaking of other distinguished Minnesotians sojourning in the Saintly City, says: Postmaster Hunt, of Red Lake Falls, too, was on hand at the Merchants, and succeeded in demonstrating to the politicians that while he was a comparatively new man in Polk county politics he is no spring chicken. His section of Polk, formerly the Democratic stronghold, he says, is now strongly alliance, the voters of both parties having gone over to the new party in about the same proportions. There are indications, according to Mr. Hunt, that those formerly republicans are thinking strongly of returning to the G. O. P.

Sunday was a big day at Maple Lake. Three bands—Crookston, Fertile and Twin Valley were in attendance, besides large number of people from each of these places. A party of Red Lake Falls people drove over Sunday, returning Monday evening. They report a most delightful time. The following persons composed the party: Misses Emma and Louise La Bissoniere, Rebecca Brunelle, Mattie Gervais, Josephine La Freniere, Sophia Cyr, Elodia Bray; Messrs. Ed. Bray, Tellesfore Brunelle, Dan Le Tandresse, Pierre Paradis, M. Marcil, Edmund Bray.

The British parliament awarded a London physician $25,000 for the discovery of the following method of purifying a sick chamber: Put half an ounce of sulphuric acid in a crucible glass or China cup and warm it over a lamp, or in heated sand, adding a little nitre to it from time to time. This produces nitrous acid vapor. Several of these vessels must be placed in the sick chamber and in the neighboring apartments and passages at distances of twenty feet apart.

J. D. Marshall is building a fine barn on his new premises.

Pete Morisette has returned and will remain for a time.

Jim Wylie is down Red Lake today.

A sidewalk will probably be laid on Fourth st South.

Mrs. Ed. Garceau entertained lady friends at tea yesterday.

The Catholic sewing circle meet at Miss Mary Brady's this afternoon.

J. W. Rodgers has a new kitchen.

Four teams are down from Red Lake to be loaded with flour.

C. Stuhr of Euclid is a bonanza farmer. He expects to thresh $25,000 bushels of wheat this fall. His crop looks fine.

Last week Mss. Joe Marco and Miss Dwyer were driving to town, and when near Fred Schmitz' their horses took fright, dumping them out onto the road. Fortunately, no damage or personal injury resulted.

Phil Kaufer is the agent of the Harry Svensgaard Bicycle Company, of Fergus Falls. Anything in the bicycle line furnished, with mere nominal charges for work done.

W. T. Spillane has joined the fraternity of bicyclists, having procured a New Mail wheel.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox is summering with her husband at Short Beach on Long Island sound, where she has just completed the erection of a cottage that is as novel in arrangement as it is attractive in external appearance. It is a square structure, surrounded by a broad veranda. The roof is supported by four large, square posts, into which the sides of the house disappear at the will of the occupant. The walls of the house are made after the fashion Venetian blinds, and when released they wind about rollers set in motion by springs on the inside of the four posts, which are hollow. Upon the inside of the walls heavy curtains are hung upon bamboo poles, so that when the rolls of the house are rolled aside the interior of the house is hidden from view, while the occupants get the full benefit of the sea breeze. Mrs. Wilcox got this idea from the Japanese tea houses.

The East Grand Forks News says: Miss Eugenia La Freniere, a talented Red Lake Falls lady, won a lot in Leroy, Marion county, Fla., by successfully rebussing the People's Illustrated Journal. That kind of bus will stand an encore. ...Maple Lake, in the eastern part of this county, is becoming quite a resort for Grand Forkers. It is said Captain Griggs and others will purchase shore property and improve the lake front.... We are proud of our fair musician Roxy Todd... After August 24th all the lands in the St. P. M. & M. land grant indemnity limits not already selected will be open to filing at Crookston....A vote to give some railroad $220,000 from the pockets of Polk county taxpayers will be held in August. What do you think of it?

We understand the Gazette will suspend publication next week.

Preserving Season.

Preserving time has arrived and below will be found a few recipes which will be of interest to all house keepers who lay in a stock of delicacies for the fall and winter season:

PRESERVED CURRANTS.

Take ten pounds of currants and seven pounds of sugar. pick the stems from seven pounds of currants and press the juice from the remaining three pounds; when the juice and sugar are made into a hot syrup, put in the currants and boil until thick.

PRESERVED PINEAPPLE.

Pare, cut and slice, take out the cores of each single with a cutter, then weigh your fruit, allowing pound for pound of sugar and fruit; put in alternate layers in the kettle and pour in water, allowing a cup to each pound of sugar; let this boil up, then take out the pineapple, spread on dishes in the sun; then boil the syrup to the soft ball or till it will jelly; return the pineapple to the kettle and boil fifteen minutes, then place in wide-mouthed glasses and cover the same as any other fruit preserved.

PURPLE PLUMS.

Take an equal amount of fruit and sugar; place the fruit in a stone jar, fruit and sugar alternately; cover and set the jar in a kettle of boiling water for six hours, filling up the kettle as the water boils away; repeat this once more and you have excellent preserves.

TO PICKLE PLUMS.

For eight pounds of fruit take four pounds of sugar, two quarts of vinegar, one ounce of cinnamon, and one ounce of cloves; boil vinegar and spice together skim and pour scalding hot over your fruit, let it set three days; pour off the syrup; scald and skim, and pour over again; continue this until you have heated the syrup three times, allowing it to stand three days between such heating.

PICKLED TOMATOES.

Let the tomatoes be thoroughly ripe and let them lie in strong salt-water for three days, then put them in jars in nice even layers, mixing with them small onions and pieces of radish; then pour on vinegar, cold, after having spiced it to taste; cover carefully and let stand three weeks before using

TO KEEP TOMATOES WHOLE.

Fill a large stone jar with ripe tomatoes, then add a few whole cloves and a little sugar; cover them well with one-half cold vinegar and half water; place a piece of flannel over the jar well down in the vinegar, then tie down with paper. Should mildew collect on the flannel it will not hurt them in the least.

PICKLED PEACHES.

Four pounds of sugar, one pint of vinegar, to twelve pounds of fruit; put sugar and vinegar together and boil; the next day drain off the liquor and boil again; do this three times and your pickles are fine; add cinnamon to the liquor and stick two cloves in each peach.

What's O'clock?

It is a common experience with any group of half a dozen gentlemen, that no two watches in the crowd make the same movementhof time. It causes no particular inconvenience, but suppose such variations occured among the clocks at the more than 3,000 stations on the great Burlington system? What assurance would there be from safety from collisions? Very little. But the system of effecting absolute correspondence between all time-pieces in use on "The Burlington," is perfect and has been reached at the expense of much money and trouble Three minutes before 4 o'clock every afternoon, an operator in the Chicago general office begins sending out the word "time," and continues it for fifty seconds. He then connects the automatic signaling mechanism, and 3,000 telegraph instruments from Chicago to Denver and the Black Hills, and from St. Louis and Kansas City to St. Paul, signal the seconds in unison with the big clock in Chicago. It now lacks one minute and twenty seconds of 4 o'clock. This is an interval of twenty seconds. Then the telegraph instruments call a doubleclick with each swing of the big pendulum for 40 seconds, and then comes three dots (Morse signal for letter "S") which having synchronizing standard clocks to bring their clocks into circuit to be automatically set with the master clock in Chicago. Another brief pause, and there comes a single sharp click, that it is just 4 o'clock. With all watches and clocks in exact correspondence, no train allowed to follow another closer than five minutes, and trains running in opposite directions carefully watched, "The Burlington" is the line for safety. For tickets, time tables, etc., call on your home againt, or write to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agen, St. Paul, Minn.

THE profile which adorns the silver dollar is that of a Philadelphia school teacher, Miss Anna W. Williams. Her profile is considered to be the most perfect of any woman in Philadelphia.

EXPERT people who were not electrocuted testify that the deaths at Sing Sing were painless. There is no one to dispute them. Electrocution might become popular for committing suicide if its methods were not so expensive.

THE breaking out of leprosy in New York City will emphasise the popular demand that the Chinese must go. The American people can submit to a good deal, but the importation of leprosy calls for an immediate and effective protest.

AN immigrant at New York, who appeared to be very indigent, was stopped at the Barge Office lest he should become a public charge, when he produced a satchel containing $17,000. He was from Russia and bound for the West.

THE fact that out of an estate of $200,000, the late Secretary Windom possessed clothes and ornaments to the extent of only about $100, would clearly indicate that a desire for worldly show was not one of his weaknesses.

IT is said that a Paris laundryman has discarded all soaps, sodas and bleaching powders. He merely uses plenty of water and boiled potatoes, and can cleanse, without employing any alkali, the worst soiled of linens, cottons or woolens.

IT is stated that Miss Catharine Drexel's convent at Andalusia, Pa., is to be lighted by the Edison electric system. There is nothing "dim, religious" about that, Miss Drexel will be able to "let her light so shine" that men, and women too, may "see her good works."

THE recruiting officers for the Army are very sensibly turning their efforts to secure men in the rural districts and are much pleased with the result. The lonely laborer on a farm is much more likely to be attracted by a soldier's life and to be contented with its routine than is the man who has tried city life for a time.

M. MAXIM, a Frenchman, who has invented a rapidly firing cannon, is now constructing a machine with which to fly. He says: "If I sail in my machine across the channel and drop a hundred-weight of nitro-glycerine upon any English city that will be the end of it." It is hoped this cheerful gentleman will never learn to fly. Any old saw is better than a maxim of that sort.

NOTHING can be permitted to ruffle the course of true love in France. The execution of Murderess Berland and her accomplice, Dore, was postponed at Paris the other day to permit the celebration of the nuptials of the executioner's son and the daughter of a provincial executioner. Were it not for amenities like these, executioners might become extinct.

ANOTHER scandal has appeared on the british horizon. It seems that not long ago the Governor of Madras gave a fancy dress ball, at which the gentlemen, including Lord Wenlock himself and other high government officials, appeared habited as devils, while the ladies were decked out as angels. These terrible disclosures have recently come under the notice of Mr. Samuel Smith, M. P., who intends to interpellate the Under Secretary of State for India on the subject.

LORD SALISBURY, talking for effect, says that the outlook for the Conservative is good, and that as to electoral reform any revision of the electorate ought to be associated with a redistribution of the seats of Parliament. He says that Ireland, Scotland and Wales are too largely represented, the inference being that in a redistribution the country would be gerrymandered in favor of the Conservatives.

A PLEASANT young man is about to be penned up in an asylum for the insane because he ventured to give Jay Gould a little advice on the art and science of gambling in railway stocks. That same fellow could have roamed the country over telling editors how to run their newspaper and nobody would have molested him; and yet they tell us that the press is a mighty power in the land.

This land was tree claimed about eight years ago and parties filed motion of contest on the grounds of non-compliance with tree claim provisions. The evidence will be forwarded to Des Moines for the decision of the general land office. The land lays within four miles of the end of the Sioux City cable line and will be very valuable.

News has just reached Corwith that Mr. Burtis had his barn burned with five horses, hay, grain, machinery, etc. Peter Nilson's barn was also struck and three or four horses killed in Tuesday night's storm. Several others had stock, cows, hogs, etc., struck, killed or injured. Heavy rain and some wind accompanied the storm, but crops are not materially damaged so far as heard from.

County Auditor Lavaque of Duluth completed the task of making apportionments of moneys to the several funds according to the tax and assessment collections for the year ending May 31. The showing is the largest ever made by St. Louis county, being $62,809 above last year. Total net collections amount to $833,542.81.

Plans for the new bridge across St. Louis river to be placed at a point near New Duluth or St. Louis, are now in the hands of government engineer for inspection and approval. The franchise calls for the beginning of the bridge by Oct. 1 and it is thought it will be completed within 90 days after the plans have been approved. It will be an iron structure.

SEAWEED.

From Bandoline to Jellies For Consumptives; From Paper to Soup.

Another sort of seaweed employed in commerce is the Irish moss, from which is obtained a jelly useful for administering to consumptive patients, as well as the well-known cosmetic for the hair known as "bandoline." The best of this moss is gathered in the neighborhood of Scituate, Mass., between May and September of each year. A similar plant is collected in large quantities below water mark to the north of Cape Cod and sold for making puddings, blanc mange and sea-moss farina. It is also used by brewers for clarifying and by calico printers.

By the Malays a species of seaweed is collected which, boiled down, produces a kind of glue called "agar-agar." This material is utilized almost exclusively by bacteriologists for breeding consumption bacilli and other such cheerful germs upon. This is because it is susceptible of being rendered in great purity and the bacteria finds it a most agreeable diet. Thousands of tons of seaweeds are gathered annually on the coasts of China and Japan, packed in bales and carried to all parts of those countries and even to Thibet for the food of the people. For this purpose the plants are mixed in soups, and with rice, fish and vegetables. One advantage of the diet is that it communicates with whatever it is mingled with a salt taste, which is a great economy for the poorer classes, who are obliged to pay very dear for salt, particularly if they live very far away from the ocean. Also these weeds have an aromatic flavor of the sea which is agreeable to the eastern palate. The Chinese also manufacture gelatine from seaweeds, which is used by bakers for making biscuits and confectionery, by paper makers and by manufacturers of stuffs for stiffening. The Washington Star says that patents have been granted at various times for making paper out of seaweeds and exclusive rights were obtained a few years ago by an inventor for utilizing dissolved and pressed seaweed in making imitation horn for cutlery, picture frames, book frames, &c. The New Zealanders utilized the large pods of a species of seaweeds for storing whale oil; they hold about one quart each and are tied up at the necks with flax fiber. The big hollow vesicles of a giant plant of similar kind serve the natives as water buckets on the Pacific coast of South America. Up to the present time comparatively little use of these marine vegetables has been made in the gastronomic way, but it is scarcely doubtful that at some future day good cooks will learn how to prepare many agreeable dishes from them, such as, in winter especially will be a godsend to the poorer classes when fresh vegetables are scarce.

A DANISH FARM.

The People Take the Greatest Possible Care of Their Cows.

The horses are strong, thick-set animals, short in height, and more like those to be seen in Suffolk than anywhere else. In Denmark, however, by far the most important animal is the cow. In appearance they are not specially striking. In size, coloring and quality they are very similar to the ordinary shorthorn breed such as one sees in the north of England, though they are if anything a little smaller.

The people take the greatest possible care of an interest in them, much more than we do in England, says McMillan's Magazine. They seem to be watched by some one or other constantly. As there are no hedges to separate the fields, the cows and other animals, including the sheep, are all tethered, and this custom itself entails, of course, pretty constant attention. If the weather be at all cold, one may often see the beasts covered with cloths as they graze. The cows are milked thrice a day, about five in the morning, then between eleven and twelve, and again late in the evening. A register is frequently kept of the amount of milk in pounds given by each cow daily. This is done without difficulty, and adds greatly to the interest and success of the dairy work. Every cow has a name.

Sheep are not reared to any great extent, though every farmer has a few. Shearing takes place twice a year—in May and toward the end of September. This work is for the most part done by women; indeed, the women generally work nearly as hard as the men upon the farms, but they do not neglect their domestic duties. The houses, which are invariably thatched and of one story only, are clean and tidy, but from the close proximity of the cowhouse to the dwelling (a door opening straight from one to the other), the smell of the beasts is rather too overpowering for unaccustomed nerves. The wife spins her own wool, and not infrequently weaves her own cloth.

Electric Bundle Carriers.

Something new is an electrical railway express service, established in a western town, by means of which, for a small charge, all the packages bound outward for the suburbs are gathered up at the depot and then delivered along the route, to the infinite relief of marketers, shoppers, and weary heads of families, who have been wont to play the part of express wagons.

Evidently there is a saving also in this arrangement for the stores which need no longer send one of their own wagons five miles out to deliver a 25 cent package. It is not improbable that a system of this kind can be worked up and developed very profitably.

LOST THEIR HEADS.

Two Youthful Accomplices in a Murder Executed by the Guillotine in Paris.

An Awful Scene Caused by One of the Doomed Men Resisting the Executioners.

PARIS, July 28.—The execution of young Berland and Dore, two accomplices of Mere Berland in what is known as the Corbevoie murder, took place this morning in the Place de la Roquette.

Dore walked calmly to the guillotine, but a desperate struggle with Berland took place on the scaffold. Finally the executioners succeeded in forcing the criminal down upon the dascule, and from there slid his head under the knife. The execution of the two men occupied only eight minutes of time. Mere Berland, as already cabled, has been granted a reprieve.

The usual crowds of people had gathered last night and very early this morning on the famous Place de la Roquette, where all Paris executions by the guillotine take place. The man-about-town and the woman-about-town were there in force, regardless of the fact that they had been anxiously waiting for the execution for a week past, and that they had haunted the neighborhood of the gloomy old prison morning after morning, daily expecting the "feast of blood" to which they had invited themselves.

Dore left his cell and the prison a few minutes later with extreme composure. He made no objections as Deibler (Monsieur de Paris), the chief executioner, assisted by his son, attended to the criminal's toilet, or executioner's preparations, in dress, etc. But though he had thus far conducted himself with wonderful courage, Dore faltered and trembled as he reached the shadow of the red-painted uprights of the guillotine and caught sight of the deadly, shining knife which was to sever his head from his body. The murderer at the sight of seemed to become dazed and helpless, and in this condition the executioners helped him up the steps to the platform of the guillotine, and quickly threw him upon the bascule, strapped him down, slid his head into the lunette, and in a second or so the knife fell, and Dore's head rolled into the sawdust-filled basket awaiting it.

Young Berland died in an entirely different manner. When he was awakened he showed a considerable amount of bravado, and remarked with a hideous smile, "No more card playing for me." In conversation with the prison officials and executioners while his toilet was being made, Berland showed that he resented his mother's reprieve and that he was very much disappointed that she was not to die with him. When all the preparations for death were made, Berland walked jauntily across the prison yard and maintained his air of bravado and cool impudence until he reached the platform of the guillotine.

Just as the executioners were on the point of throwing him upon the bascule or sliding plank to which he was to be strapped pravious to being pushed beneath the knife, Berland made a desperate resistance and a terrible scene took place in full view of the thousands of eager spectators gathered in the Place de la Roquette. In spite of his struggles, however, the executioners and guards held Berland upon the scaffold and eventually threw him upon the fatal plank, slid him beneath the grim uprights and, as the young criminal was writhing furiously, the knife fell and Berland's head rolled into the basket.

No sooner had this occurred than the crowds, with a combined, mighty rush, broke through the cordon of troops and police and rushing up to the scaffold, gloated over the blood-stained apparatus, some of the most depraved taking a handful of sawdust away with them as a souvenir of the execution.

FORTY-THREE KILLED.

PARIS, July 28.—Official reports received from St. Mande, near Vincennes, the scene of the collision between the two excursion trains loaded with passengers returning from a musical festival at Fontenoy, show that forty-three people were killed and that one hundred and four people were injured by the accident. Six persons died after being extricated from the ruins.

Many of the unfortunate people imprisoned beneath the wreck of the railroad cars were drowned, while partly roasted, by the firemen who were summoned to the scene. Forty minutes elapsed before the firemen were able to obtain water, but when they did so they poured torrents upon the wreck and seemed to be utterly unaware of the fact that they were drowning the people they were attempting to rescue.

To-day the town hall of St. Mande presented a fearful spectacle. The blackened bodies of the dead lie in rows upon the floor and upon tables in that building. In some cases the remains are but little more than heaps of cinders intermixed with portions of limbs and fragment of other parts of what were but a short time ago human beings, laughing, chatting and singing in jovial contentment. One pile of charred limbs and human cinders was especially conspicuous, as it consisted of a mass of unidentified and unconnected bodies placed in a heap.

Among the injured sent to the hospital a number died immediately after admission, and many are expected to succumb. Many causes are given for the disaster, and charges are made that it was the work of wreckers, but nothing definite is known.

Shot by Customs Officers.

SEATTLE, Wash., July 28.—George Poor, a well known deputy sheriff and ex-customs inspector, was shot and killed to-day at Wooley by Customs Inspectors J. E. Baird and James Buchanan. J. E. Terry, an ex-policeman of Seattle, was also seriously wounded. It is said the shooting was caused over a band of Chinese, who were being smuggled into the United States from British Columbia. Both parties were on the track of the Chinese, and when Poor and Terry captured the Mongolians it was stated that Baird and Buchanan opened fire epon them.

Talked in His Sleep.

NEWCASTLE, Pa., July 28.—David Newton, aged twenty-five, of Shenango township, was arrested to-day, charged with murdering William Riser of Shenango township, a farmer, on April 3, 1889, near Wampum. Newton, Riser and James Booher were all drinking in Wampum on April 2. The next morning the mangled body of Riser was found on the railroad track. It was supposed he had fallen on the track and been killed while in a drunken stupor. It is charged now that Newton talked in his sleep lately, and has said that he murdered and robbed Riser. Newton claims that the charge is false and the result of spite work.

THE PENROSE MURDER.

Important Arrests Made in Butte and Boise City, Idaho.

BUTTE, Mont., Special Telegram, July 28.—Important arrests in the Penrose murder case were made here to-day. William Deeny, Eugene Kelly and Phil Hickey were arrested to-day and formally charged with murder. Hickey was arrested in Boise City, Idaho, and will arrive here tomorrow. Deeny and Kelly were arrested on their way to dinner to-day. Deeny stated that he expected arrest.

The men are all members of the Miners' union and had been assailed by the late Editor Penrose in his paper with the most virulent abuse.

THERE'S NOTHING IN IT.

More Denials of the Story That Nettleton Intended to Resign.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, July 28.—An effort has been made to show that there was a great deal of friction between Secretary Foster and Assistant Secretary Nettleton. In fact, it has gone so far that reports have been published that the assistant secretary was going to resign. To the PIONEER PRESS correspondent Gen. Nettleton said:

> There is not a word of truth in the statements that there is any friction between the secretary and myself. We are on as good terms as when Secretary Windom was at the head of the department. I have no intention of resigning and going into private business.

The Evening Star explains how some of the rumors were started in the following:

> There appears to be a mistake in the story which has been published that Assistant Secretary Nettleton intends to resign because he was not permitted to appoint his son private secretary. Mr. Nettleton's son is eight years old, altogether too young for the place. Mr. Nettleton, therefore, is not in any complications on the appointment of his son. The men involved in that are Treasurer Nebecker and Assistant Secretary Crounse. Mr. Crounse appointed his son as his private secretary. Mr. Nebecker made similar provision for his son. In each case the secretary refused to confirm the appointment. Then a brilliant idea occurred to some one. Mr. Crounse appointed Mr. Nebecker's son and Mr. Nebecker appointed Mr. Crounse's son. This deal was not satisfactory to Mr. Foster and the two sons are still out, or at least are not drawing pay from the government. It is not supposed that either Mr. Nebecker or Mr. Crounse will resign in disappointment.

Mr. Foster says:

> There is absolutely nothing in the story that there is any misunderstanding between Assistant Secretary Nettleton and his superiors, and the rumor of his contemplated resignation on account of any grievance is news to me. All my associations with Mr. Nettleton have been of the most friendly character, and if he should leave the service it would not be for any of the reasons claimed.

All of this discussion about friction in the treasury department has arisen on account of the recent action of Superintendent of Immigration Owen "deciding" that labor for tin plate factories could be imported under contract. The fact is that Owen's alleged decision amounts to nothing all. It will need the sanction of the secretary of the treasury or one of his assistants acting for him before it would be a decision. Both Foster and Nettleton are displeased with the action of Owen, and it is quite likely that he will be turned down in the matter before long. The men who want to import contract labor will have to prove that the tin plate industry is not established, and that the labor cannot be performed by American workmen.

PORTER WANTS A PLUM.

The Census Man After a Fat Position in the World's Fair.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, July 28.—Bob Porter, census man, is now after a fat position in the world's fair machinery.

The reported slipshod manner in which the world's fair is being run, with large salaries, nothing accomplished and a general jumble of everything connected with it, together with the reports that a large amount of money is being squandered, tempts the census botcher to look for a place, as he would no doubt be at home in something of that kind. Porter asks first for the position of chief of the board of awards, and what a snap that would be, as many a concern is looking for an endorsement by having the highest prize or medal from the world's fair. If Robert fails to get the awarding job he wants to get the chairmanship of the committee of manufactures, a place where his peculiar high tariff talent will be utilized by the barons to their mutual benefit.

The census job is almost over; the money has played out, and the head of that grotesque affair is looking for something equally as lucrative. If any one thinks that Bob Porter is in this country for his health he is mistaken.

A BEAU AMONG BELLES.

Commissioner Carter Cuts a Wide Swath at Old Point Comfort.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, July 28.—Commissioner Carter, of the general land office, stole away Saturday night from his duties, and, in company with Gen. Clarkson and Marshall Cushing, went down to Old Point Comfort.

Reports have been received from there in which it is stated that the handsome commissioner, with his form in a natty bathing costume, is the greatest beau among the belles of the beach that has been seen there this season. Even the fierce mustachios of the army officers were not in it with the Brother Jonathan whiskers of the Montana man. He also excels as a yachtman, and surprised those who thought that a Montana citizen had no use for water.

Senator Pettigrew says that in all the time he has been in publiclife and having a large amount of business before the land office he never knew a better commissioner than Mr. Carter. He says that Carter has brought ability, combined with executive skill, into the office, and the business has been moving along as it never moved before. The growing popularity of Mr. Carter in the land office may make him secretary of the interior before the end of the present administration. Secretary Noble has been absent many weeks and nobody knows where he is or why he remains away from his office.

The Dickinson Saloons.

DICKINSON, N. D., Special Telegram, July 28.—A motion will be argued this week in the chambers of the district judge at Bismarck to dissolve the injunction issued two weeks ago restraining the saloonkeepers of Dickinson from selling their goods. The principal complaining witnesses have petitioned the court to withdraw their action, repenting the move on the ground that the sale of liquors would not in this way be lessened; but this will not settle the case, it having been placed in the hands of an outside attorney, who is pledged to prosecute.

ALASKA.

Ice built, ice bound, and ice bounded.
 Such cold seas of silence! such room!
Such snow light! such sea light confounded
 With thunders that smite like a doom!
 Such grandeur! such glory, such gloom!
 Hear that boom! hear that deep, distant boom
  Of an avalanche hurled
  Down this unfinished world!

Ice seas and ice summits! ice spaces,
 In splendor of white, as God's throne!
Ice worlds to the pole! and ice places,
 Untracked and unnamed and unknown!
 Hear that boom! Hear the grinding, the groan
 Of the ice gods in pain! Hear the moan
  Of yon ice mountain hurled
  Down this unfinished world!

THE LEMON RUBY.

Mr. Knickerbocker Blazer of Fashionable avenue, away up town, has just learned the secret of a mystery that wrecked his young life, blondined his hair in twelve months, and came near dragging him down to an untimely grave with a moldy tomb attachment.

Mr. Blazer, it will be remembered, is the owner of the famous precious stone known as the Lemon ruby, and that was the Jonah that caused him to sit up nights and grow old before his time.

He still owns the famous stone, but the mystery that surrounded it, like its gold-plated setting, has been torn away, and its power as a Jonah gone forever. Precious stones can only Jonah when surrounded by a mystery.

Years ago young Knickerbocker Blazer was the favorite nephew of a rich but eccentric old uncle, who was fond of mysterious and exciting adventures. One day this uncle sailed away in his sloop yacht, the Mystery, for the west coast of Africa. Months grew into years and he had been given up for lost, when one day Knickerbocker received a letter and a package from his uncle.

In a postscript to the letter the uncle wrote: By the same mail I send you a present of a rare precious stone, which has a wonderful history. On the upper left corner you will find a faint red spot, like a bloodstain. A seer or a prophet may read the mystery of the stone in that red spot.

> Sealed to a pouch made of the skin of the sacred horsebreast, I inclose a key to the mystery of the stone, written on sacred parchment from the tombs of the Pharaohs in Egypt. Let the seers and the soothsayers reap the legend of the red spot if they can, but the true key to the mystery must not be opened until you receive news of my death. And, my dear nephew, remember you must never part with this precious stone. It is a gift possessing a strange power, and to part with it will bring disaster, perhaps death, upon you. On account of its color I call the stone the Lemon ruby.

That was all. That was the way Knickerbocker Blazer came into possession of the wonderful ruby.

The strange color, the mysterious red spot greatly interested young Blazer and he determined to learn the secret of the precious stone without delay. He took up the package containing the key and turned it over and over in his hand. He decided to open it and put his hand in his pocket for his knife. Suddenly he felt a sharp pain in his hand and withdrew it to find a small stream of blood flowing from a jagged cut in the palm.

He was holding the stone in his hand and a sharp point of it had penetrated the flesh. It was a warning; he would respect his uncle's wishes, and the seal of the key remained unbroken.

In later years the thought of how much misery he might have saved if he had solved the mystery of the Lemon ruby that night haunted Knickerbocker Blazer like a nightmare.

He could not open and read the key, but he would try the seers and the fortune-tellers; they might be able to read the mystery in the red spot.

Putting on his light spring overcoat Knickerbocker Blazer took the precious stone and started out in search of one of those mysterious individuals who look into the future at $2 a look and unravel mysteries at so much per ravel.

Crossing the avenue on his way to the home of the fortune-teller Knickerbocker saw a beautiful little girl playing on the street-car track, unconscious of the fact that a team of street-car horses were approaching at the rate of four miles an hour.

The brave young man did not hesitate an instant. With no thought of the danger to himself he sprang forward and snatched the child from under the very feet of the horses. He moved away a few steps, still holding the little girl in his arms, and then a tall woman came out of a house across the street, and cried: "Police! police! Stop, you villyun; don't steal me child!"

Knickerbocker Blazer put down the child as a policeman came running up, and tried to tell in a modest way that he had just saved the little girl's life, but his voice sunk to a moan under the weight of the clubbing he received. At the station-house he finally succeeded in convincing the sergeant that he was not a child-thief, and with his head still sore and bleeding he went on in search of the seer who could read the mystery of the Lemon Ruby.

The seer was found at last. She said she was the seventh daughter of a seventh daughter and had unraveled mystery for pay since she was 10 years old.

Blazer handed her the stone and a $2 bill and read to her the postscript of the letter from his uncle. She passed her hands over her eyes several times, then looked long and intently at the red spot on the Lemon ruby. At last she spoke: "Yes, yes; I can see it now; the lines are plain, but they were not written by human hands·

"It is a curse; the owner of the stone will be disappointed in everything he undertakes. Throw it away; it may do you some great harm. A terrible curse goes with the ownership of this ruby. The grandfuncle of the brother-in-law of its first owner was murdered. See?"

The lady who was reading the secret of the mystery advanced quite close to Blazer and held the stone before his eyes with one hand. She held it there several moments, and told him to look at the red spot, and he could see the lines of the written curse for himself.

He could not see the lines, but when he left the house his watch and scarfpin were missing. He concluded they had been swallowed up in the mystery, and then Knickerbocker Blazer made a bold and desperate resolve. He would disregard his uncle's warning and get rid of the stone. Better face disaster and death free than to walk the earth weighted down by a Lemon ruby that was a Jonah any way he could fix it.

With a firm step he walked down to the river and out on a dock. He raised his hand to throw it far out in midstream, but just then a rotten plank in the dock gave way, and he fell into the water. When a wharf rat in a boat fished him out it took two doctors and a policeman half an hour to bring him back to life, and then he found the ruby securely wedged between two of his fingers.

"I am a doomed man," Knickerbocker Blazer muttered as he walked home in the dark night. Suddenly a wicked idea entered his brain and drove out everything else. A month before he had been jilted by a black-eyed soubrette. She had encouraged him until he was madly in love, and then told him he could only be a brother to her. Now, he would be revenged. He would send her the Lemon ruby.

Early the following morning a messenger boy was started with the mysterious stone, which he was instructed to deliver to the black-eyed soubrette. The boy fell in an open manhole before noon, was hit in the stomach by a pitched ball in the fourth inning of the ball game in which he played that afternoon, in the evening a mad dog chased him ten blocks, but he delivered the package in time to escape with his life and report back at the office at midnight.

For a week Knickerbocker Blazer breathed without the haunting dread that his next breath might also be his last. He was safely rid of the Lemon ruby. But one day a messenger boy brought him a package and a note, and he accepted both, little dreaming of the danger. The package contained the ruby, and the note was from the black-eyed soubrette.

"My punishment is greater than I can bear," she wrote. "I return your ruby; it is all I have left to return. The day after I received it I eloped with a man I believed to be a rising young tragedian, but the day after we were married I learned he was only a second juvenile man, without an engagement for next season."

Blazer shuddered as he looked at the ruby, but it was some satisfaction to know that it had brought trouble to the heartless woman who had scorned him. He decided it would be useless as well as dangerous to make any further effort to get rid of the ruby; so he kept it and lived on with a haunting dread of unseen trouble.

One night Blazer was walking the streets alone at midnight, brooding over his fate. He clutched the ruby in his hand and cursed it, but he dared not cast it from him. It was horrible to be bound helpless to a Jonah.

A bright light burning in the richly furnished parlor of a handsome house attracted the attention of Blazer. He was a modest man and a perfect gentleman, but he was in the power of that stone and was not responsible for his actions.

He crossed the street mounted the stoop, and, finding the front door unlocked, walked into the parlor that had attracted his attention. He found a beautiful woman there alone. She gave a slight scream at his sudden appearance, and when he tried to explain that it was all the fault of the ruby she screamed again. Then a big man, with a revolver in his hand, rushed into the parlor. He was the lady's husband. Blazer took in the situation in an instant, and in spite of the evil influence of the ruby he resolved to save the lady from embarrassment.

"Don't shoot: I am a burglar, but I'll surrender. Call the police," said Blazer, in a dramatic manner. A policeman was called in, and in a few moments Knickerbocker Blazer was on his way to the station-house as a common burglar. The disgrace, the horrible consequences of his confession, a term in prison, all came to him with great force, and he resolved to make an effort to save himself.

Better death than disgrace. He made a dash for liberty and the policeman fired. The ball struck his side as he turned a corner, but something in an inside pocket stopped it and Blazer sped on in the darkness and escaped. The something in the inside pocket that stopped the bullet was the little pouch containing the key to the mystery of the Lemon ruby. The bullet cut half way through the pouch and stopped.

Reaching his room at last Knickerbocker Blazer, with a wildly beating heart, tore open the pouch and drew forth the key to the mystery of the Lemon ruby, the stone that had cursed his life. It was written on a piece of cardboard and read:

"Tricky Boys.

"What is the reason we hear so many boys saying "Honor bright!" to each other when they are making trades or promises? Is it because boys can not trust one another, and are obliged to put an extra proof that they mean to fulfill their obligations?

A few days since I heard one boy say to another: "You would better look out for Fred Wilson; he is a tricky boy." Inquiring into the matter, I found that "tricky" in Fred Wilson's case meant getting the best of the bargain in trades by representing things to be better than they really are; making certain promises that he never fulfilled, and did not expect to fulfill when he made them. He was a boy who was not reliable, and nobody could depend upon him. Yet Fred was a fine talker; the boys said he could get around anybody if he tried to. Some boys who thought themselves quite clever had been "taken in" by him.

Now, boys, do you know what kind of a man Fred Wilson will make? Unless he changes very much, he will be a dishonest, unjust, unreliable business man. There are too many such men in the world already. What we need are true, square, honest dealers in business everywhere. The boys who are growing up to take positions of trust and responsibility in life should begin now to be straight in all their transactions with each other. Don't represent what you have to offer in trade better than it really is. A number of years ago there was a boy whom I knew who used to "swap" chickens and rabbits with other boys. He made it a point to get the best of the bargain always, if not by fair means, by unfair ones. He generally made these bargains with boys younger than himself. When he got older he managed somehow to keep himself in pocket money, which his family, having a hard time to make ends meet, could not furnish him with. He had a "knack," they said, of keeping himself in money. Small pieces of money were often missed in the house-hold, and sometimes at the neighbors,' and oftentimes he managed to get the pennies away from the small boys at school. Nobody seemed to suspect him of getting it dishonestly, although he was always known as a "tricky boy" among his school-mates. When he became a man he was given a position of trust and responsibility. He handled a great deal of money, and no one suspected him of being dishonest in any way. But the time come when it was found that he had been stealing thousands of dollars from his employers. He is in the state prison now, and just before he went he confessed his crime, and said: "I was always dishonest; when a boy I did not seem to have any true sense of honor. If I had only begun then to be straight and square in my dealings, I should not be a convict in state prison to-day."—Susanna Paine.

Overcoming.

Less than two years ago an English gentleman died who was the father of a large family, a member of Parliament, a prominent county magistrate, the owner of large estates, and an active public-spirited man in all local and national matters.

So loyal were his friends to him that they never made public mention of the one great misfortune of his life. It was never even hinted at in the newspapers. In fact, it was only after his death that those who had not seen him knew that it was but the misshapen block of a man that had lived this active manly life.

He was born with neither legs nor arms. After his death his story was told: How he resolved when but a boy to act and live as did other boys, without regard to his horrible misfortune; how he persisted in studying every book, in learning every game, in joining in every amusement possible to him with his companions. How, to the last year of his life, he held himself to be as responsible as other men, and bravely paid every tithe of duty to God and to his fellows.

Even in lesser matters in life he pressed to the front. He was the most genial, witty guest at social dinner tables. Everywhere his cheerfulness and gaiety gave new life to duller souls.

What weight of pain he carried beneath this courage only God knows.

Is there no lesson for us all in the life of this gallant gentleman?

Every boy or girl has some drawback, some difficulty to combat or, harder still—to bear. It may be deafness, an ugly face, a vicious temper, deformity, or a dull brain.

Be sure that every other human being has his difficulty too. Ignore your own, forget it when you can, and above all get above it. "Make of your petty grief a pedestal on which to stand."

Epictetus would have sent no words of wisdom down through the ages but for his lame leg. John Bunyan would not have dreamed the dream which has helped the English-speaking world if he had not been shut up in a gaol. If Father Damien had not died a leper, his life could not have given to many a sincere heart fresh strength and courage.

A Narrow Escape.

"All night," he says, "we were kept awake, more or less, by three lions serenading us, and the carriers had enough to do to keep their bivouac fires burning. I, however, got a good night's rest. Next morning, when passing through a clump of long, seedy grass, I heard distinctly in front the low angry growl of a lion. The man who was before me stopped, saying it was a buffalo, and asked for my gun that he might shoot it. I urged him to push on, and tried to prevent the three boys from stopping; but it was too late to avoid the brute's charge. The lion made straight at the lad who was carrying my hat and blanket. I ran back and succeeded in intercepting the lion, so that, in his spring, he fell short a few feet from his intended victim and alighted before my very face. The man and three boys dropped their loads and were off like deer, leaving me alone. I raised my rifle, aimed, and the cartridge failed to explode. To my horror, the lion approached deliberately, and, while, I stood like a statue, petrified with terror, he sniffed me all over like a great dog, and then dropping his tail walked away slowly, leaving me unharmed, although so weak from fear that, for an hour afterwards, I shook like one in an ague."

Two Brave Boys.

Ben Wilder came running home the other day, and called his brother Bob.

"Bob, I've found out how we can earn the money to buy our bicycle!"

"Good!" exclaimed Bob. "How can we?"

"There's a man up at Forest's store who says he'll pay us ten cents for every quart of berries we'll pick, and you know the pastures and swamps are full of blackberries."

"Hurrah!" cried Bob, throwing up his hat. "We'll do it."

"Yes. Come up to Forest's with me, and we will settle where to deliver them."

Away the two went, and were soon deep in the trade with the man from the city. The arrangements were made, and the boys turned away to begin their picking. Ben stopped for a last question:

"What are you going to do with all these berries?"

"Make wine of them—wines and other liquors. I belong to a liquor firm."

"H'm—yes, sir. We just wanted to know."

The boys walked away, but they looked at each other soberly, and soon stopped.

"Bob," said Ben, "we can't do it. We don't want to help make drunkards. Let's go back."

They went back and told the man that they could not sell their berries for that purpose. He was very angry, and called them names, but the boys stood firm. They have not yet saved enough to buy their bicycle, but they never regretted their decision Children's Friend.

Lamp Rock of Central Asia.

Captain younghusband, Eannglish traveller, writes home from Central Asia an account of a rock which has been a mystery to the natives and travellers. It is situated on the shores of a lake near one of the branches of the upper Oxus, and is known as the Lamp Rock. The account of it is published in the Geographical Magazine. This rock received its strange name because from a supposed cave in its side a perpetual light shines out. Mr. Elias, who passed the spot in 1885, thought the light might be a phosphorescent one, but he did not have time to examine it properly. Younghusband says the rock stands by itself about two hundred feet high, and projects from the mountain side. High up the steep cliff the cave was pointed out to him, and sure enough there was a pale light visible. The natives have a superstitious dread of the rock and say the light comes from a diamond in the forehead of a demon, who guards his vast treasures stored in the cave. With great difficulty Mr. Younghusband ascended to the cave. A false step, in some places, would have meant certain death. He entered the cave and saw the light, which he found to be merely the unadulterated light of heaven, coming from the other side of the cave. In fact, it is no cave, but a tunnel right through the rock. From below, the fact cannot be determined that the hole is not a cave, and the light striking up against the roof is all that can be seen.

Norman Humor.

Superstitions about rocks, which were once popular among the peasant classes of Europe, are dying out. The familiar legend is of a rock which, moved at a certain time by some strange witchcraft, revolves or rolls aside, and discloses treasure hidden beneath, the time being especially inconvenient for witnesses, as for instance, "on the stroke of twelve on Christmas Eve." A peculiar story of this kind is still told in Normandy. M. Julien Tiersot writes of it in the Revue des Traditions Populaires:

In the neighborhood of Caudbec-en-Caux there is a stone which the country people say, revolves while the bells ring the Angelus at noon on Good Friday. A walk in the country in the spring at the hour of noon is an agreeable diversion, and the sceptical stranger readily consents to go and see the alleged magical stone.

The stranger and his escort reach the stone and wait. Time passes. It is afternoon.

"But the stone has not moved?" he says.

"Wait, you have not heard the Angelus rung yet," is the smiling reply, and one might wait forever, for on Good Friday the Angelus is never rung.

WE are making a specialty this season of what we call our PARAGON HARNESS. Made of the FINEST STOCK and the very BEST WORKMANSHIP. Such a harness cannot be bought for less than $25. at retail. But we are willing, in order to introduce it, to SELL ONE SET ONLY to one person as a sample for $16.50.

$25.00 HARNESS FOR $16.50

IN GENUINE RUBBER $18.50.

DESCRIPTION OF HARNESS.

A fine Buggy Harness stitched twelve stitches to the inch, except traces which are stitched ten. Is made to represent a $30 harness. It has a 3 or 3 1-2 hand laced, leather pad saddle, with covered seat and jockeys; is made from fine stock. Bridle is of usual dimensions, has fine blinds, nice leather front and beautiful rosettes with glass centers, nice nickel bit. Check-rein, either overdraw with nose piece, or side check. Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strap, breeching and girt folds are made either of patent enamel or plain harness leather as preferred and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased, give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Boxloops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O.Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St.Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

To Prevent Frost.

Last year the NEWS published an article on the subject of smoke as a preventative of frost. This year this subject has been taken up and enlarged upon, the press is full of it, and practical methods have beenestablished.

The Grand Forks Plaindealer has been gathering information to prove the value of smoke as a preventative of frost. It says: There are many persons in our state who can testify to the fact that smoke is one of the best frost preventatives. Captain Griggs of Grand Forks says: "I have observed that the burning of straw, brush, manure, or any combustible material has a tendency to raise the temperature for miles away," and he also states that on the night of the burning of Walker's saw mills a few years ago, it was cold and wheat was frosted in many places in the Red River Valley, but in all the path of the wind drifting the smoke from the mill for a distance of 25 miles from Grand Forks, no wheat was injured by the heavy hand of Jack Frost. John W. Maher, of Devils Lake, has recently stated: "If every tenth farmer would put out a good smudge and keep it burning during the night, it would save the entire crop. I tried the effect of smoke in 1888 and saved crop ¾ of a mile distant as effectually as that beside the stack." H. B. Ryan, living near St. Vincent has had good success with smoke in protecting his vegetables from frost. The writer has had similar experience. And whole wheat fields have been saved in the north east part of our state by the burning of straw stacks and smudges on frosty nights.

CLOUDS PREVENT RADIATION OF HEAT—WHEN TO LOOK FOR FROST.

There is a difference between frost and freezing weather. The latter comes with a cold wave which, according to the present knowledge upon the subject, is difficult to avoid; whilst the former results from a cooling superinduced by intense radiation of heat in a clear sky, and it in a great measure can be guarded against. If the sky is obscured or cloudy or the wind quite brisk, little or no danger may be anticipated from frost. Clouds act like mantles to the earth and hold in its heat, which in their absence, through the radiation, would escape into space. Winds agitate the air, and bring down the warm masses 15 to 20 feet above, and diffuse through the cooler at the surface of the earth, thus keeping up a mild temperature. A thermometer placed on the soil in a clear night will indicate 5 to 10 degrees or more lower than when suspended in the air six feet above the sod. The air temperature finds its lowest point at sunrise, and it rises gradually to its highest point about 3 p. m. From that time it goes down by rapid degrees until just before midnight and slowly from then until sunrise.

THE THERMOMETER WILL GIVE UNMISTAKABLE EVIDENCE OF APPROACHING FROST.

If it be a calm, cloudless night and the farmer takes careful observation of the thermometer, say at 6 to 10 p. m., and discovers it to be steady, and some degrees above freezing point (30 degrees), but little danger may be anticipated from the frost; but other wise, if it drops quickly to near 40 degrees, there is great danger of frost. Every farmer should have a first-class thermometer, or what is betbetter a psychometer. The instrument should be so placed as to receive the unobstructed air currents from the west or the north. The thermometer will give from 5 to 6 hours warning of the approach of frost. Its coming may also be known by the slightly chilly sensation in shady places that is experienced on a clear day, and to the experienced observer, there is something in the appearance of the atmosphere that tokens the approaching chill.

An Obscure Fund.

The interested parties of St. Joseph's congregation will be happy to know how the heavy loan of the so much disputed $15,000 has been disposed of since June 1st, 1888, viz:

The Chippewas' Troubles.

From the Thirteen Towns.

The Chippewa Indians of White Earth who have been expecting that the $150,000 due them from the government, for damage to their lands, caused by the overflow of water thereon by reason of the putting in of the reservoir dams, would be in cash, are doomed to be disappointed A short time ago Agent Schuler was instructed to ascertain what was most needed in the way of supplies and implements by these people. The agent reported that the Indians refused to accept anything but a cash payment. The Indian commissioner at once telegraphed Agent Schuler that he didn't want the views of the Indians, but wanted a report with a recommendation as to what was most needed, by the agent himself, that the department would then settle the matter, but that under no circumstances would a cash payment be made, for the department had learned by experience that a cash payment was detrimental to the Chippewa Indians, and that the Hon. H. M. Rice had advised against this mode of payment. The government has just been paying a large sum in cash to the Indians in the vicinity of Wahpeton, North Dakota, and why such payment is beneficial in regard to this band, and detrimental in relation to the Chippewa band, must be a puzzle to the ordinary citizen, which nobody probably outside of a government official would attempt to explain. If the government honestly owes this debt to these people, then they should be at liberty to obtain their pay in the same way that the other creditors of the government are paid, and no distinction should be made.

If We Knew.

Could we but draw back the curtains
That surround eachother's lives,
See the naked heart and spirit,
Know what spur the action gives,
Often we should find it better,
Purer than we judge we should;
We should love eachother better
If we only understood.

Could we judge all deeds by motives,
See the good and bad within,
Often we should love the sinner
All the while we loathe the sin.
Could we know the powers working
To o'erthrow integrity,
We should judge eachothers' errors
With more patient charity.

If we knew the cares and trials,
Knew the effort all in vain,
And the bitter disappointment,
Understood the loss and gain—
Would the grim, external roughness
Seem, I wonder, just the same?
Should we help where now we hinder?
Should we pity where we blame?

Ah! we judge eachother harshly,
Knowing not life's hidden force;
Knowing not the fount of action
Is less turbid at its source.
Seeing not amid the evil
All the golden grains of good:
Oh! we'd love eachother better,
If we only understood.

Vote No.

The arguments of the Crookston real-estate boomers in favor of bonding the county is growing more rediculous every day; they recognize that something desperate must be done for their town now that the Red Lake reservation is coming into market. Every one recognizes the fact that the benefits to accrue from the manufacture of the pine will be further up the rivers than Crookston and if they cannot induce the people to build railroads to their town all is lost. The hamlet must remain as it is. The question is, will the farmers contribute to heap a tax upon themselves and their posterity by voting for those bonds. The more you look into the fabulous agreement made and entered in for the purpose of robbing the farmers, concocted by some shrewd individual who no doubt is in it for a slice of stock, the more apparent does the deception appear. This agreement is utterly worthless in every particular. The parties binding themselves are at perfect liberty to transfer their stock in the road, in fact to transfer the whole road, should it ever be built, to some other corporation who would immediately raise the rates. Provided, however, the rate is a gain of three cents per bushel of wheat to farmers—from this section and east and north the farming community would be compelled to haul their grain such a distance that the trip could not be made in a day. Fifty bushels of wheat is a good load. At a three cent gain the farmer by voting the bonds and procuring the road would make one dollar and fifty cents—his expenses for himself and team will amount to at least two dollars, thus leaving him minus fifty cents for his two days hard work. This is one of the benefits and shows the profit to come to the farmer by voting bonds upon himself, his children and his children's children. Ah, but they, the committee of business men, say the other roads must carry your produce for the same rate as this Duluth & Dakota. Without the Duluth and Winnipeg, the Duluth and Dakota would be naught. One might regard these two lines not existing but mathematically speaking the two negatives make a positive and in this sense we will consider how far the Duluth & Winnipeg will help out its off spring. Every citizen of Minnesota knows what energy the Duluth & Winnipeg exerted in endeavoring to bribe legislators into giving the land grant they asked. So much money has been spent in this corrupt way that the road must remain where it is. Construction has ceased and the road has been offered for sale. If this road was sold how, pray, would the Duluth and Dakota fulfill its agreement with the people of Polk County? How would it gather the wheat and other products to Duluth. No doubt the N. P. or Great Northern could purchase the D. & W. any day it desired. Where would then be the D.&D. and those who voted bonds to build it? we can see them only in the soup. Every farmer who does not want the sting of remorse prying deeply into him—for being cought in a foolish snare—should turn out and vote against the bonds.

Communicated.

SILVER MOUNTAIN, Ont., Can., July 31.—James I. Wyer, Esq., of the First National Bank of Red Lake Falls, was in our mining district Friday. I believe he intends to buy an interest in the Gopher Mining and Milling company of this place....On the south west of Whitefish lake a vein was reccently discovered by John D. Gehl, a well known explorer in Algoma and taken up by Mr. Chas. Jarvis, who, I believe is known in Port Arthur. The mine will eventually be known as the "Jarvis Mine." From the surface of this vein were taken fine specimens, carrying argentic sulphide which, having both seen and tested, I can vouch for. This circumstance is further added to by indications of previous work which have been discovered on the property. We have found the vein cut transversely by deep workings now overgrown by brush and weeds. These cuttings or pits will occasionally run to 50 feet in depth and leave slight, if any, doubt, that they were originally the work of the natives. At the time of writing, these cuttings or shafts have not been fully explored, but it is my intention to let you have the first news regarding the prospects after exploration. Should this prove a property of value, as I doubt not it will, it will bear out the impressions I have entertained for the past two years, namely, that the south shore of Whitefish Lake is to be the mineral producing region of Ontario.

Game Laws.

Frank L. Stetson is now state game warden under the state game commision. In order that sportsmen may have no chance to plead ignorance of the law he has issued the following synopsis of the new game and fish laws on open season and penalties.

Twenty-five dollars reward by the board of game and fish commissioners of the state of Minnesota for information that will cause the conviction of any one violating any of the provisions of this law.

How They Feel at McIntosh.

From McIntosh News.

Articles have been filed with the county auditor to vote two hundred and twenty thousand dollar bonds to build the Duluth & Winnipeg rail road. The proposition is to give to give the rail road company the bonds and they are to build the road into Crookston by Dec. 1st, 1892. We are reliably informed that it will be called the 25th of August. Crookston desires to have it called at that time, as the farmers would be busy harvesting and not turn out to election. Do not depend on your neighbor to vote down this scheme to bond your homes to build railroads, but go to the election and take your neighbor. Do not rest in security, and say that it will be defeated, but turn out to defeat it. Leave your harvest fields and go to the polls and put down one more more of Crookston's schemes. ....J. P. Johnson, the commissioner from this district, positively refused to sign the proposition of the railroad Co. to bond the county. But they succeeded in getting C. P. De Mers, our weak brother, to sign an article to betray the farmers who trusted him.....The McIntosh Times makes the announcement that its columns are open for the discussion of the railroad bonding question. We make the announcement of no farmers for sale. No railroad bonders need apply at this office.

Theodore Reder, a saw mill man and rancher, living fifteen miles back in the hills, came to Rapid City recently and reported that early one morning his stable was broken open and two horses and two saddles stolen. Reder started in pursuit, but lost the trail. He thinks that Reddy Lightfoot, a burglar, and Mell McDougall, a forger, who broke jail at Deadwood a few days ago, are the thieves. By this time they have probably got across the state line into Wyoming or Montana.

WISCONSIN.

N. Bowton, the Bayfield lumberman, sold five million feet of lumber to Z. B. Barker, of Chicago. It involves the sum of $60,000.

Henry Emder, proprietor of the Emder house of Portage for more than thirty years, died recently after a long illness. He sold his house.

Deputy Sheriff Knight's father, H. Knight, aged eighty-five, died from concussion of the brain at Durand. He was thrown from a wagon while on his way home.

During a rain storm the smokestack of the Chippewa Falls Manufacturing company blew down, doing considerable damage and shutting down the works for one week.

The first raft of logs that was ever brought across Lake Superior arrived at Ashland recently. There were 2,000,000 feet from Beaver bay in the raft, to be cut. It is thought this experiment will result in bringing a large amount of Canadian lumber here to manufacture. Six million more will follow.

Col. John C. Spooner has been secured by the regents of the State University of Wisconsin to deliver a series of lectures before the law department. This will identify him regularly with the law faculty to deliver about one lecture a month during the progress of the collegiate year. It is now pretty well understood that Mr. Spooner will continue his home at Hudson.

The board of education of Chippewa Falls let a contract for the erection of a $12,000 school building, to be completed about September. This will make the seventh school building in this city and does not include the three large parochial schools owned and maintained by several Catholic congregations here.

While Elisha Kinney, a farmer living near West Salem, and family, were on a visit, Fred Myers, the hired man, entered the house and went through bureau drawers and a private desk, securing about $400 in money, several certificates of deposit on the Batavian bank, of this city, a note for $400 due next fall and valuable papers. The robber was traced to La Crosse, where he purchased a ticket for Chicago and left on the midnight Burlington.

IOWA.

Nicholas was thrown from an electric car at Dubuque, and killed.

Otto Beymer, a young man residing at Afton, climbed a bee tree and began sawing off a large limb. The limb split and pinioned Bymer into the forks of the tree, causing his death.

Grasshoppers are damaging the oats crop in the vicinity of Waterloo. It is estimated that they will lessen the yield by 10 bushels per acre. They are of the common native species.

A fatal contagious disease has broken out among the cattle in Palo Alto, Emmet and Kossuth counties, and many are dying off. The state veterinarian, Prof. M. Stalker, and Assistant E. E. Sawyer are making a thorough examination.

Newton E. Carleton, aged 19, committed suicide at the home of his sister, Mrs. Gibson, on West Thirteenth street Des. Moines. He had been unsuccessful in obtaining employment and was very despondent. He left a note saying he was tired of living and would end his life. He took poison.

A. Y. McDonald, founder of the pump factory in Dubuque, which bears his name, died of paralysis, with which he was attacked two years ago. His disease was the result of a pistol shot received from a burglar about ten years ago. He served during the war in the 1st and 21st Iowa infantry.

A mysterious disease has broken out among cattle west of Lyons in Lyon county. The joints swell at the knees, death soon follows and after death blood and matter flow as the swellings burst. Local veterinary surgeons term it the blackleg. Seven or eight cattle are already dead and others are believed to be affected.

Men to Shake Shirts.

The shirt has come to stay, says the Boston Globe. A month ago it was regarded as a whim of the season, now it is established in favor and counted an indispensable feature of a well-dressed woman's wardrobe. Heretofore Dr. Mary Walker had sole claims on the stiff shirt bosom.

Later, came Mrs Jeanette Thurber in her tweed cut-away coat jauntily buttoned over a waistcoat and soft-finished shirt, and from the date of American opera to the last gasp of the Italian schools she remained the one devotee of the feminine shirt in New York society.

Now all the tailor-made girls in town are done up in stiff bosoms, standing collars and long cuffs, and the old-established shirtmakers have been called upon to make to measure the nether garment so long the undisputed property of men.

The result is a lady's shirt as snug fitting as a glove and as comfortable as a fichu, which under the lightest tailormade bodice does not show a crease. By means of darts the usual bagginess at the sides is done away with, and but for the drawstrings at the waist might be appropriated by the men.

The most recent developments, as adapted for ladies' wear, is the washing silk in twills of the neatest design. They are made to fit like the linen ones, have a band down the front and a stiff collar, with another to turn down over it.

Perhaps the comfort as well as the auntiness of these shirts forms their chief recommendation; they allow perfect freedom of movement, they are cool, and always look neat and fresh.

Not only are they seen on the promenade, under yachting, tennis and cycling jackets, but under well-fitting riding coats they are decidedly smart.

From all appearances society has adopted the shirt as a fashionable and feminine garment.

Collecting Stamps.

A story is told in the Boston Herald of an elderly uncle who left to his nephew the entire contents of his house, which was very nearly all he had to leave. In the uncle's desk was found an enormous accumulation of papers, for he had much correspondence with many corners of the world, and had carefully preserved every letter he had received. And, what is more, inside the fold of every letter was the envelope in which it had come.

The nephew, who was an ingenious young gentleman, saw a small fortune in this seeming triviality. Many of the foreign and colonial stamps on the envelopes were of great value, and he sold them en bloc to a dealer in foreign stamps for several hundred pounds. Some of these very stamps may, perhaps, have found a place in the exhibition which lately opened in Vienna, says a London journal.

It clearly will not do to laugh at the stamp maniacs any more. Stamp collecting is no longer confined to schoolboys, but has become the amusement and often the passion, of millionaires.

For to make a collection with any approach to completeness is only possible to a millionaire—or his son-in-law. It is, we believe, a member of a French branch of the house of Rothschild who possesses the most complete collection. It seems rather a crazy thing to give £50 to £100 for a postage stamp, but the man who does that is no worse than the book collecter who gives a handful of sovereigns for an edition which is half an inch taller than one for which he would not give half a crown. We are all mad on some point, so by all means let us have free trade in manias.

Ballooning as a Sport.

Ballooning should be encouraged as a recreation. As there is little ballooning done in this country very few know anything of this charming experience, and nearly all have an exaggerated idea of its danger. In Europe, and especially in Paris, free balloon ascents are quite often made, and as a natural results the Frenchmen make good balloons. Ballooning is not more expensive than yachting, and to my mind it is much more interesting. A good silk balloon with a capacity for two people—say one holding 24,000 cubic feet of gas—costs in France $500 or $600. Here it would cost rather more. The gas is cheaper there also, but if one has a good balloon and does his own work the whole expense of ballooning here ought not to average over $100 for each ascent. With a little previous study and the practical experience of a few trips one can manage his own balloon. Under ordinary circumstances two persons make the best number for an ascent. A balloon club, having a fleet of well constructed balloons, could have excursions and races on the same plan as that of yachting and canoeing. It is an art or recreation that has been neglected. At all events it has been left mostly to professionals, who indulge in its most risky features and given it the name of being a very dangerous sport, which it need not have.—Forest and Stream.

Serenading an Absent Couple.

A most disgusted crowd in Saco, the other evening, was one that, after making itself hoarse and tired by an hour and a half spent in serenading a newly married couple and in vainly trying to get the groom to respond, was at last thanked for its music by the groom's father, who volunteered the further information that his son and wife were in a neighboring village.—Lewiston Journal.

SIX KILLED AT ONCE.

A Bloody Altercation Between Men Employed on a Tram Road in Southwestern Louisiana.

Six Men Killed at Once, One Mortally and Three Seriously Injured.

LAKE CHARLES, La., Aug. 4.—Yesterday, at Lock, Moore & Co.'s tram road, an altercation between the men there employed took place, in which ten men were shot, six of whom were killed at once and one mortally wounded. The remaining three are seriously injured, but may recover. The difficulty took place about twenty miles from here. The fight is known to be a result of an old feud.

SWIFT AND FIERCE FLAMES.

A Large Chicago Retail Dry Goods Store Completely Destroyed.

CHICAGO, Aug. 4.—Fire, involving a loss estimated to be at least $1,000,000, broke out at 7:30 o'clock this morning in the large retail dry goods and notion store of Seigel, Cooper & Co., southeast corner of State and Adams streets.

The blaze started in the exchange room, on the first floor, and spread through the inflammable stock with the greatest rapidity. It was but a few minutes after the first alarm was given until the entire interior was a mass of flames. Every available piece of fire apparatus was called to the scene. Any attempt to save the building was hopeless, and the fire department devoted its efforts toward preventing the flames spreading to the adjoining buildings.

About twenty-five employes were in the store at the time, but all of them, as far as known, managed to escape uninjured, except one cash boy, who was on the third floor. He started to come down by the fire-escape, but became confused, lost his footing and fell, receiving severe injuries. There were three watchmen in the building at the time, who have not yet been accounted for. The building was entirely gutted and the Adams street wall fell in after the iron interior framework had been softened by the heat.

The cash receipts of Saturday, aggregating between $15,000 and $20,000, were in a safe in the building, but whether or not they have been destroyed by the heat or not, is not yet known.

The flames caught in the rear of James H. Walker's large dry goods store, just back of Siegel, Cooper & Co.'s, and fronting on Wabash avenue, but they were soon extinguished. The heat broke the plate glass in the "Leader," another large dry goods and notion store on the northeast corner of Adams and State streets, and it looked for a time as if that building was doomed, but it was saved after a hard struggle. The losses are as follows:

Siegel, Cooper & Co., $500,000 on stock and $40,000 on the building, insurance $500,000; The Leader, Demberg, Gleck & Harner, loss by smoke and water $100,000, covered by insurance; James H. Walker, dry goods, loss bp smoke and water $50,000. C. Pennecke & Co., crockery and bric-a-brac, $4,000, insurance, $33,000; Costikgan & Bedrosin, Turkish rugs, $5,000; John A. Bryant, piano agent, $5,000; I. W. Baird, pictures, $5,000; Woman's Exchange, $2,000; the Bell, dry goods and notions, $5,000.

Most of the smaller losses are covered by insurance. The Leader building is damaged $10,000; covered by insurance. The Walker building is only slightly damaged. The damage to the Woman's Exchange building is $10,000; insured. The insurance on Siegel, Cooper & Co.'s stock is divided up among a great many companies in amounts ranging from $1,000 to $11,500. The St. Paul German's loss is $6,500, and the St. Paul Fire and Marine's $7,500.

IN A COOP.

Two Alleged Chicken Thieves From St. Paul Arrested at Dundas.

NORTHFIELD, Minn., Special, Aug. 4.—Dundas is all agog with the capture of two chicken thieves hailing from St. Paul. They commenced their exploits in the middle of the week and were not "rounded up" until Thursday.

While Amos Hutton was on his way home Wednesday night near Little Prairie school house, a chicken coop outfit which he passed on the road excited his suspicion and he aroused several of the young men in the vicinity and they gave chase, overtaking the festive midnight marauders near the Hazelwood school house, about four miles from Dundas. They found that the parties who were out with chickens so late were Joe Bowen and son from St. Paul, both of whom formerly lived in that vicinity, and were accordingly well posted as to the whereabouts of the feathered tribe; at least so the reports of sufferers would make out.

The Bowens at first showed fight, but after some parleying and threatening, during which Bowen senior fired off his revolver a number of times at Marion Hatfield's head, Hatfield shoved his revolver in Bowen's face and caused him to wilt. The wagon was upset, and after some more blustering the capturers sent to Dundas for Marshal Swartwoudt, who went out and placed the outfit in the Dundas "cooler." The news of the capture spread very quickly, and there was a large turn out when the trial came off.

Among those who had been robbed were A. Hutton, C. M. Hatfield, Robert and Adam Johnson, William and John Ennis and N. Bateman. A very considerable quantity of chickens have been stolen around Dundas the past summer, and it is probable that the Bowens are responsible for the entire loss. They were found guilty by the judge and bound over to the district court in $900 bonds, in default of which they were taken to Faribault.

A Demented Man Killed.

LAKE CITY, Minn., Special, Aug. 4.—Nicholas Conrad of this city, aged sixty-five years, who has been afflicted with dementia for some months, wandered down the railway a few days ago, and, while sitting on a bridge, was knocked off by a train and his shoulder dislocated. He was taken by the trainmen to Wabasha and locked in the depot building while the telegraph operator in charge went for assistance. When the latter returned Conrad was missing, having crawled through the window. Last night the unfortunate man was run over by a train at King's Cooley and killed, his legs being severed from his body. The remains were brought here. He leaves a widow and four sons, two of the latter being in business in St. Paul.

Mrs. Blaine Bound to Have It.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D., Aug. 4.—Ever since Mrs. J. G. Blaine, Jr., has been in this city she has boarded, with her son, maid and nurse, at the leading hotel. To-day, under the instructions of her attorney, who is prosecuting her claim for divorce, she rented the Fleming cottage, located on Duluth avenue, the principal residence street of the city. This move is under the theory that boarding at the hotel does not perfect one's residence, and, should she continue at the hotel, the judge would refuse to grant a decree. Mrs. Blaine is anxious to get separation papers and is willing to comply with the requirements necessary to secure them.

INVESTIGATING IMMIGRATION.

Valuable Information Secured by the Commission Now in Europe.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4.—Dispatches from the United States immigration commission now in Europe to the treasury department state that the chairman, Col. Weber, and Dr. Kempster have gone to Russia by way of Germany, where they are now prosecuting their inquirics. Commissioners Cross, Powderly and Shulties will carry on their inquiries in Great Britain and the southern portion of the continent.

The dispatches indicate that a large amount of valuable information is being collected, no obstacles being interposed officially or otherwise to the investigations which are being made. In an interview between the commissioners and the Mormon elder in charge of Mormon emigration at Liverpool, that official, who is acting in the place of Brigham Young, Jr., stated that while he and all Mormons believed polygamy to be right, yet, as the United States supreme court had decided the anti-polygamy law to be constitutional, the Mormon church had adopted a rule against its practice in the United States, and that all Mormon converts abroad are so informed before their embarkation for America.

He further stated that whenever the question was asked converts were assured of the rightfulness of polygamy, but of the legal impossibility of its being practiced at present in the United States or Great Britain; also that they must not go to America if they don't intend to obey the law and abstain from polygamous marriages.

TIN PLATE WORKERS.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Aug. 4.—Capt. Judson N. Cross of Minneapolis, who is a member of the investigation commission, has submitted to Gen. Nettleton, in connection with his report upon immigration matters, the result of his special study of the tin plate workmen in Wales, which the general thinks will form an interesting and instructive part of the labor of the commission.

Capt. Cross has also been investigating the manner in which skilled laborers of Scotland in stone and brick work and also other lines near the seaboard secure a good living. He has ascertained that these Scotch laborers come to this country, work eight months in the year and then return home and live in idleness the other four months, pay their passage ($17) each way and an assessment of $12.50, imposed by the labor unions of this country, and yet are enabled to make more than they would in their own country by working the entire year. It is possible that Gen. Nettleton will be called upon to devise some method of regulating this kind of labor.

WENT TO EXTREME LENGTHS.

A Sioux Falls Man in Jail Because He Cannot Pay a Judgment.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D., Special Telegram, Aug. 4.—Capt. C. T. Jeffers, deputy warden of the penitentiary, captain of Company B, state guards and a resident of this city for a dozen years, has been sent to jail.

The circumstances are that on the night of Nov. 17, 1889, when the ratification of the election of R. F. Pettigrew as United States senator from South Dakota was in progress Capt. Jeffers, who is an old time soldier, was firing the cannon. Near where he stood was a grove forming a background, which prevented him from seeing any one who might attempt to pass. Miss Maggie O'Rourke, aged about thirty years, came along the sidewalk in time to have a small piece of skin knocked off her leg by the explosion of the cannon. She brought suit against Capt. Jeffers and ex-Mayor Porter Peck for damages. The suit was released so far as Peck was concerned, and judgment was obtained against Jeffers for $9,500. Mr. Jeffers is not pecuniarily able to pay and Miss O'Rourke's attorney has gone to the length of getting an execution against Mr. Jeffers' person, and he will have to remain in jail for ten day, at least. The community unites in the belief that the proceedings are spite work and an outrage on Capt. Jeffers.

REPUBLICAN UPRISING.

Fifteen Men Attempt to Overthrow the Spanish Government.

MADRID, Aug. 4.—The city of Barcelona was greatly excited last night by an attack upon the garrison. About fifteen men well armed approached the barracks, and, when challenged by the sentry, rushed upon the guards, firing as they went, and attempted to force an entrance into the barracks. The troops were hastily summoned to arms, and, after a brief delay and desperate conflict, the attacking party were overpowered and captured. It was spread abroad that a revolution had been attempted by the Republicans, and the city was greatly agitated. The government announces, however, that the attack was brought about by speculators who sought to cause a decline in prices on the bourse. The prisoners will be court-martialed and doubtless shot.

The latest report from Barcelonia justifies the belief that the affair was a genuine revolutionary attempt on the part of Republicans. The loyalty of the troops frustrated the Republican designs, which included a plan for a general uprising at Carthagena, Balboa and other towns.

A Case of Mother-in-Law.

SEATTLE, Wash., Special Telegram, Aug. 4.—Dr. Arthur T. Sherman, a prominent physician, a few days ago quietly took his three-year-old boy Victor from his mother's house and started for Buffalo, N. Y., where he resided before marrying his wife in Minneapolis.

The home life of Dr. Sherman and his wife has not for many months past been blessed with happiness, nor did matters take on an encouraging outlook when the doctor would renew his importunities to his wife to leave the house occupied by them and take up their home in several others which he offered to provide. His entreaties were disregarded by Mrs. Sherman, who refused to quit the home provided for her by her mother.

Dr. Sherman was never loth to express a dislike to his mother-in-law, and two weeks ago left home, declaring his intention of remaining away forever. Mrs. Sherman thinks it is a bluff to entice her to leave her mother, as he did the same thing last April. Other persons in the city who claim to know the unfortunate state of affairs believe that Dr. Sherman will not return, but will resume his old practice in Buffalo. He is said to have worked up quite an extensive practice since coming to Seattle.

A Real Estate Operator Assigns.

BOSTON, Aug. 4.—Samuel Hano, real estate operator at Alston, Mass., has assigned to his father, Louis Hano. His liabilities are $500,000 and gross assets $1,000,000. Inability to obtain real cash is the chief cause of the assignment.

Another Scandal Promised.

LONDON, Aug. 4.—A scandal of very serious character is impending over the Irish party. The arrest of one of the anti-Parnellite M. P.'s for bigamy is among the possibilities. If the current story is true, he has married a second time, his first wife being alive and undivorced. He may have a valid defense to a criminal charge in the assertion that he believes her dead, but, as she is not dead, the second marriage at any rate is worthless. It is said that this story will be of interest on two continents, and that the M. P. involved will have to retire to private life.

Shedding His Duster.

Yesterday forenoon a tall, slim man, wearing a faded Greeley hat, and well enveloped in a linen duster of ancient date, entered the Woodbridge street station and said to the the sergeant:

"I just came in on the train. Look at me and see if I resemble Capt. Kidd or Charlie Ross."

I can't see that you do," replied the sergeant.

"But people are all looking at me and grinning. Anything wrong in my dress?"

"Well, that—that duster is a little off, perhaps."

"Oh, it's the duster!" People don't wear 'em any more, eh?"

"Not that style and color."

"I see! I'm a little ancient!"

"A trifle."

"Well, off she comes. I bought it in this town six years ago. The man warranted it to me as a combination duster, hammock, flying-jib, liver-pad, bed-blanked, burglar-alarm, life-preserver, and certificate of moral character, and it has pulled me through a steamboat explosion, two railroad smash ups, a hotel fire, and half a dozen free fights. Kinder hate to go back on her but style is style. If the style has changed then I've got to change with it."

He pulled it off, rolled it into a bundle, and laid it on a chair and said:

"Give it to some poor and disconsolate man—some one who hasn't a sensitive soul. It has kept out the flies, warded off the moths, and saved me from rattlesnakes and mad-dogs, but the time has come when we must part. When I strike Detroit and hear a boy call out: 'Is that thing alive?' I know he means me and that duster. When I go up street and a man calls out: 'Schooner ahoy!' I know he means that duster and me. When I go into a car and see the women look me over and then hitch away I know they are wondering which of us is who and whether it will bite or not. I'm too sensitive by half, but I can't help it. I leave her in your hands. Good-by."—Detroit Free Press.

Women Never Read a Sign.

"Why sir," an infuria ted correspondent says, "I want to tell you a story. On one of the streets leading off Tremont street there is a large blank wall of a building and on this blank wall a neighboring photographer has erected a showcase. It is full of his cards, with name and address on each, the entrance to this place being the next door to the east of the showcase. But of course all around the showcase is a blank wall. Well, I stopped there the other day to look at a photograph of the Harvard nine, and just then two well dressed ladies came up. 'Can you tell me, sir,' one of them said, in a piteous sort of tone, after they had stood still a few moments, 'how to get into this place?'

"'What place, ma'am,' said I; 'the photographer's?' 'Yes,' said she. 'Next door that way,' I said, looking aghast that any one should ask such a question. The two started for the place. Walking right by the slab which had upon it the addresses of all the occupants, including the photographer, they stepped into the back entrance to a dry goods store which is there. In a moment they came blundering out and then went into the back entrance by pure accident, I suppose, because they never stopped to look at the sign. Now, do you pretend to tell me, sir, that a creature who thinks she can get into a blank, dead brick wall and find a photograph gallery in there somewhere knows enough to vote?"—Bangor News.

What is Rattan?

Every one knows the pretty, light and graceful chairs and other articles of furniture made from rattan, but every one does not know that the extremely tough and flexible wood called rattan is that of a climbing palm-tree. This curious climber (which is more of a vine than a tree) is one of the singular characteristics of forest growth in the Celebes and other Malayan countries. Starting with a trunk as thick as a man's leg, it winds through the forests, now wrapping a tall tree in its folds, like some gigantic snake, and then descending again to the earth and trailing along in snake-like curves until it can find some other stately tree to fasten and climb upon in its pursuit of light and air. The forest is so thick and jungle-like that it seems impossible to follow the course of any of these serpent climbers; but there is little boubt that at the last the successful aspirant, which stooped and cringed so long below, will be found shooting up like a flag staff a dozen feet or more above the tree which has helped its rise. A use of the rattan, which is unknown to those who have not seen it in its native forest, is a water carrier. The thirsty traveler has at all times a tumbler of cool, refreshing water at his command by cutting off six or eight feet of the rattan and putting one of the severed ends to his mouth, or holding it over a dish to catch the water. A Thrifty Undertaker.

A few days ago George Wild, a citizen who was fairly well known in the Seventh ward, died at his home, 228 High street. The death certificate was filed at the board of health yesterday morning, and some time later an eminent physician called at the office and told a somewhat surprising story about the case. When Wild died one of the first things done was to secure the services of an undertaker. Henry Wedekinst was engaged. He supervised in person the preparation of the body for burial, and at last, when all was ready, the widow was brought into the room to take a last look at the remains of her husband. As she looked she discovered that something was wrong with the body. She looked again, and then turning to Undertaker Wedekinst she said: "This is not George's coat. There must be some mistake." "I think it is," said Wedekinst. "It is the one that was given me for the purpose." "No, it isn't," said the now indignant widow. "The coat he was to be buried in was a Prince Albert, and you've got it on!" Sure enough, the coat belonging to the undertaker had been ripped open at the back and placed upon the form of the dead man. The undertaker acknowledged his mistake and swapped back.—Buffalo Courier.

Novel Way to Subdue Dogs.

A gentleman who has had a good deal of experience in the management of dogs says that the most vicious brute can be conquered speedily by any powerful odor, especially a pungent odor like ammonia. He tells how he once won a wager on handling a dog that few persons could approach. It was in a little town in Canada. The conversation being on the subject of dogs, the proprietor of the inn where he was stopping laid a wager that his visitor could not put his hands upon a dog chained up in the back yard.

"All right," said the visitor, "but as a matter of precaution for the protection of my hands I will go up stairs and put on a pair of gloves.

"I put on a pair of old buckskin gloves," says the old gentleman telling the story, "and saturated the right hand with ammonia. We then went out to the dog, and at my approach he rushed from his kennel with open mouth. As soon as he got within reach I thrust out my right hand. Instead of biting it he turned tail and ran into his kennel. Then I went to the kennel, and, putting my hand inside, made him come out again. The secret of the matter is that a dog can't bite without drawing in his breath, and as he does so he inhales the ammonia, which partially suffocates him and subdues for the time being his bitting propensity. Some dogs may be subdued with cologne."—New York Times.

Maguire's Joke.

From the New York Star.

A good story is afloat in Brooklyn about Patrick Maguire, the keeper of the Morgue. "Pat" is a strict temperance man. In the neighborhood of the institution for which he cares a saloon was started, which soon became a hanging-out place for objectionable persons. Maguire begged the proprietor of the liquor store to stop the noises in his place that were so annoying to the residents in its neighborhood. As these appeals proved unavailing, he determined on another plan of crusade. He has a son, a big, strapping fellow, who is known to everybody in the vicinity of the Morgue as Maguire's assistant in his ghastly duties. One morning, when there was an unusually noisy crowd in the objectionable saloon, Patrick called his son to him and ordered him to go to the water cooler and take the ice from it. When the lad had obeyed his instructions, Maguire said:

"Now go over to the saloon and press your way up to the bar; put the ice on the counter and say to the proprieter: 'There's so many bodies in the Morgue this morning that this is all the ice father can spare you."

Young Maguire did as he was told, and the trick operated splendidly. The crowd of drinkers scattered as if plague-stricken, and the place remained deserted until it was learned that the ice incident was only one of Maguire's jokes.

A Father's Fatal Act.

A-nine-months-old child of John Chapman, of Delmar, Tioga County Pa., died recently under peculiarly distressing circumstances. The little one having a very troublesome time in cutting its teeth, the father thinking to relieve its sufferings, attempted to lance the child's gums. He used a jack-knife and performed a very bungling operation, cutting deeply into the gums. He was unable to stop the flow of blood and summoned a physician, but he too was powerless to stop the flow of the life current and the child breathed its last three days later.

A Ghost in London.

The story goes around in London that a ghost has really been seen. A well known woman, just before appearing in some private theatricals, saw an old friend standing near the entrance of her dressing room. She greeted him, but he only shook his head and walked away. She learned the next day that her friend had died the day before she thought she saw him.—San Francisco Argonaut.

PRECIOUS DIAMONDS.

STRANGE STORIES OF HOW THEY HAVE BEEN LOST.

A Tale of a Jewel and a Lover—A Ring Lost For Two Years and Found In a Skirt—The Part a Girl's Parasol Played.

The facility with which jewels and other valuables will disappear and be lost from sight under our eyes is a phenomenon that still remains unexplained, but an incident occurred a few days ago that was decidedly unique. A young married lady, who lives on Olive, just beyond Grand avenue, says the Post-Dispatch, was the sufferer, and she lost a valuable diamond ring. She was spending an hour at a down-town establishment where manicuring, massage and baths of various kinds are administered to many women of fashion, when the proprietress noticed that she had tied something securely in her handkerchief and held it out in her hand to be placed in safety.

"I have tied my diamonds in my handkerchief," she said. "You may look at them if you choose."

"Indeed I will, for I love precious stones," said the proprietress, taking them and settling down in the next room, leaving the door ajar.

While she was examining them with great enjoyment and counting the finger rings, which all had handsome settings, some of magnificent diamonds, her daughter came in, her purse in her hand. Turning to her daughter she said: "Come and see what pretty diamonds Mrs. S. has."

The daughter and mother looked at the jewels and duly admired them all, and just as the mother was going to replace them in the handkerchief she noticed that one ring was missing.

She searched diligently without finding it and had almost come to the conclusion she must have counted wrong, but upon asking Mrs. S. she had her own impression confirmed that there were six when she received them. Both herself and daughter looked everywhere, shook out their skirts, the rugs, the table covers, yet no ring dropped out, and no trace of it was found in the room. By this time the owner had joined them, and a most diligent search was instigated with like disappointment.

"It is one of the handsomest of all," said Mrs. S., "a $600 diamond that was my engagement ring."

The proprietress had become much excited when the ring could not be produced and she gave orders that no one should enter the room until the ring was found. In looking carefully over the room but one place was discovered where any article the size of a ring could be lost, and that was a little place under the chair board where a piece had been torn off.

"I'll send for a carpenter," said the proprietress, "and have the chair board ripped off and see if it could have rolled under that space."

She told the daughter to go quickly to the nearest point where they could obtain the help of a carpenter, and just as the young lady was leaving the room she lifted her parasol, and with a resounding noise the missing ring fell out. It had dropped into the parasol while the young girl stood by her mrother looking at the rings. There was great rejoicing among those ladies, and they vowed they would not touch anybody's diamonds ever again.

Another accident occurred to a lady who used to visit St. Louis every summer on her way East. She had very beautiful rings and one that she valued greatly. She had taken a drive with Judge Ireland, once the governor of Texas, one afternoon and wore that ring. Just before she reached home before leaving the buggy she discovered that her ring was gone. She felt so dreadfully at her loss that they returned part of their drive in the vain hope of finding it and made a diligent and thorough search of the buggy, all to no purpose.

She turned her rooms upside down when she got home, hoping to find the ring, although she remembered seeing it on her third finger during the drive. The ring was not found, and a year afterward she had never heard of it, although a large reward had been offered to anyone who happened to find it. Two years afterward she was preparing for her usual eastern trip, when she determined to have a dress she had had a long time ripped up to bring to St. Louis to have colored. When it was being ripped loose from the skirt lining the seamstress who was doing the ripping said: "I keep feeling some weight in this dress at the bottom and I can't locate it." After she had nearly completed her ripping she shook the goods, and out dropped two magnificent rings with a solitaire diamond of the first water.

"My ring! My ring!" the lady exclaimed, jumping forward and picking it up. Then she remembered that the dress just ripped was the dress she had worn upon the day she missed her ring, and evidently she had put her hand in her pocket and there was a rip somewhere between the silk and the lining.

Another incident is even more curious. A pretty young lady who does not live very far from Vandeventer Place had a lovely pair of solitaire earrings and she lost one of them, to her infinite sorrow. She could not find it anywhere and, she resigned herself to doing without diamond earrings. But she had a sweetheart that she loved very much and whose birthday was approaching. She determined to make him a very handsome present and at the same time dispose of a sad remainder. She took the solitary earring to a jeweler and had her lover a beautiful scarf pin made and presented it to him on his natal day. About two years after the little earring had first reposed upon his bosom, she was in the garret unpacking a box of things. Presently her eye was attracted by something that glistened in the fringe of an old-fashioned silk shawl. She caught hold of it and behold her missing earring.

Then it came over her that she had worn that shawl and packed it away about the time her earring had disappeared.

MOTHERS AS MATCH-MAKERS.

The Point at Which the Parents' Interference Ought to Stop.

There is a kind of match-making which it is a mother's duty to attempt, writes Amelia E. Barr in the Ladies' Home Journal. But it has strict limitations. It resolves itself into the simple duty of introducing to her daughter young men whose moral character is good, who are in a position to marry, and who, physically, are not likely to repell her. The young people may then safely be left to their own instincts. There should be no attempt to coerce; no moral force used to make even a suitable marriage; though extremities may lawfully be used to prevent an evil marriage. A mother's match-making really begins while her daughter's education is in progress. And it is one of the strangest of facts that mothers generally force this education in the direction of those qualities likely to amuse young men—music, dancing, singing, dressing, playing games, chatting wittily, etc. Now, such attractions are likely to procure plenty of flirtation; but young men rarely marry the girls they flirt with. And why do not mothers consider, most of all, that approaching period in their daughters' lives when they will, or ought to, cease being made love to? Why should the preparation for young ladyhood absorb all the girl's education? How many curriculums contain any arrangement for education for wifehood or parenthood? Yet, what man wishes to pass his life with a woman whose only charm is the power to amuse him? He might as wisely dine every day upon candy sugar.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe writes: "The woman suffrage movement is a part of the new order. We are becoming baptized into the great faith of a common humanity. Woman, now is your time!"

GOOD LUCK.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is often called the Good-Luck Baking Powder.

Owing to the fact that good luck always attends the use of Dr. Price's, it is not essential to use it the moment it is mixed nor is it required to have the oven always just so as in the case with ammonia or alum powders. It is not luck after all, but the exact accuracy and care exercised in the preparation and combination of all the ingredients of Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder. Competent chemists are employed to test the strength and purity of each ingredient. Nothing is trusted to chance. Hence; it is always uniform in its work.

House wives never fail to have "good luck" in making most delicious bread, biscuit, pastry and cakes that remain moist and sweet. Only Baking Powder that contains the white of eggs.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from Ammonia, Alum, or any other adulterant. In fact, the purity of this ideal powder has never been questioned.

[illegible] her to do a chore, and yesterday she broke the soup tureen. I thought mebbe she was in love, but I see now she had this thing on her conscience."

"But she came with such a good recommendation from her last place," pleaded Anne.

"Them that tempts is as bad as them that takes," edged in Miss Carver. "It's wicked to leave money round where it will entice an ignorant girl like Bridget."

Anne, who was still kneeling by her mother's side, turned round on the defensive. "Now, Miss Carver," said she, "don't go and spread this story all over town, for it might prevent us from catching the thief."

"You are impertinent, Anne Bissell," and Miss Carver, highly indignant, flung out of the front door.

"There's one thing about it," said Mrs. Bissell, rousing up as a gleam of hope came into her mind. "I think those bills could be traced and got back if a body only knew how to set to work in the right way. There were eight tens and one twenty all marked with the letter B and a little cross with blue ink in one corner. I've been in the habit of marking my big bills in that way for a good many years, and it shows how careful I've been about money that to my knowledge I never lost a penny before in all my housekeeping."

"I think that mark on the bills is an excellent clew," said the doctor. "I know a young detective in the city who can work up the case. I will set him on it if you say so. There isn't anything of the kind those fellows cannot ferret out if you give them time. Of course the money wasn't passed here, and you will have to look for it in Boston."

"Bridget went over to Appledale last Sunday," said Mrs. Bissell, after musing, "to see her married sister who lives there, and she has been in a very bad temper ever since."

"I tell you what," said the doctor, suddenly inspired; "we will get out a search warrant for Bridget and her sister. [illegible] and I will run over to Appledale and have her sister's house searched. We may find the money all there in a lump. If nothing comes of it we can go through Bridget's things here when I come back, before she gets wind of what has happened."

Mrs. Bissell and Anne were deeply grateful to the doctor for his active interest. They had never before known the joy of having a man to lean on in an emergency. Bissell was practically useless on such an occasion, and now he had been away teaming it for a week, and of course gran'ther was too old even to take it all in! Anne shouted at him until she was hoarse to try and make him understand, and then he went about shaking his head and talking to himself for half a day.

The doctor came home early in the evening from Appledale, rather damped by the result of his expedition. He had found an officer, and had succeeded in searching Bridget's sister's house, but without avail. The act had brought a tide of indignation on his head, not only from Mrs. Rooney herself, but from the neighbors, who were ready to hoot him out of town. Bridget's sister, it appeared, was a highly respectable person, and had also a power of tongue that seemed to blister where the words fell. The doctor was threatened with a shower of brickbats and a hot water douche if he remained another fifteen minutes in Appledale, and he was glad to beat a hasty retreat by the first train.

Nothing daunted, however, he pushed the investigation into Bridget's trunk that night by aid of one of the Littlefield constables, but nothing was found there but the poor girl's belongings, and Bridget went out of the house at midnight sobbing violently, and vehemently declaring it was a wicked thing to take away a poor girl's character when there was not a particle of proof against her.

CHAPTER V.

Anne was obliged to help get the dinner, to burn her pretty cheeks over the cook stove, and blacken her white hands with dishwashing. Miss Carver came to the kitchen as often as possible to see the auburn haired princess in her fallen state. Anne turned her back on her brusquely, for she disliked dishwashing, and greasy pots and kettles filled her soul with abhorrence. It was painful to be exulted over by her enemy, who, in her hypocritical voice, assumed that Anne was very fortunate to have the opportunity to learn housework, which, in her position in life, would prove useful. There was no time now for piano practice or those little skirmishes of pleasantry in which Anne and the doctor had been wont to indulge. She could not even snatch a moment of time to regale his horse, Buckskin, with lumps of sugar. The doctor made excuses for frequent visits to the kitchen, and came to the conclusion that Anne was prettier there than when they were singing their songs together in the little parlor. His Cinderella needed no fairy godmother to heighten her charms.

Miss Carver had now great budgets of news to carry to the Widow Harkaway. The two dear friends spatted rather more than usual, as the widow had made up her mind that the doctor had taken the money, and could not be moved from her intrenched position. The doctor knew that the part he had assumed in the matter was telling against him in the town. His zeal in what was considered a wrong direction had led the Irish to include him in the general boycott against the Bissell family, and had stirred up some prejudice in other quarters, but when he looked at Anne he felt he would have imperiled his position five times over for her sake.

One August afternoon a telegram came to the doctor summoning him to a friend suddenly taken ill in a city hotel. There was just time to catch the train, with hardly a minute to spare, but as he was rushing out of the door, bag in hand, he remembered something left undone and turned back to the parlor, where his landlady was sitting. "By the way, Mrs. Bissell, here is my board for the week," and he placed a folded bill in her hand, then turned and again dashed away. When Anne came to the room a few minutes later she found her mother sitting in the armchair bolt upright, quite stiff and rigid, as if stricken with paralysis. Her brows were knit, her white lips pinched together, and she sat gazing stupidly before her, with the bill the doctor had given her tightly clinched in her hand.

"Mother! mother!" cried Anne, "is it that bad stitch in your side?" and the girl stood panic stricken gazing at her mother's white face.

"Oh, Anne! what a blow this will be to you!" and she mechanically held out the bill.

Anne took it and turned it over in her hand.

"Don't you see?" said Mrs. Bissell in an agitated whisper. "He was in a great hurry to catch the 2:40 train, and he pulled this bill out of his pocket hurriedly and thrust it into my hand for board money."

The color had left Anne's face. She brought the bill close to her eyes and examined it all over, and in one corner she detected a faint capital B with a little cross in blue ink close beside it.

[illegible] back and forth with her apron to her eyes. "And I had grown so attached to him, almost as if he was one of our own folks. I was so glad to have him here, and now it seems as though my heart would break."

It was now Anne's turn to sink down on the sofa trembling and white as chalk. "You don't mean, mother, that you think he robbed you? You would not dare to say it," and the color rushed back in an impetuous flood to Anne's face.

"I don't know what to think, Anne. I'm completely stunned. He might have been up. You know he told us how poor he was when he was trying to get up a practice at Kettletas. Perhaps it was a sudden temptation, and he thought he could put the money back before I should discover the loss. You know some folks thought it was queer he should take such an interest in trying to catch the thief, and his efforts have come to just nothing at all. It might have been done to cover up."

"Only such town gossips as Miss Carver and Widow Harkaway ever suspected any wrong motive on his part. Why, he was just goodness itself, Mother Bissell, and you know he was, and now you are turning against him."

"I don't believe you would think he could do any wrong if you saw him in the act," returned Mrs. Bissell with mild asperity.

"I refuse to believe this, mother, for it is unreasonable and impossible," and Anne boldly put on an air of perfect assurance. "He has received this horrid bill in change somewhere and hasn't looked at it. Do you think he would incriminate himself if he was a thief and had robbed the bureau drawer?"

"Don't seem like it, Anne," said Mrs. Bissell gloomily, sinking her chin into the hollow of her hand. "But a body never knows what folks will do when they think themselves safe from getting found out, and he came to us a perfect stranger, and we did take up with him and trust him to beat all. It all comes back to me now as clear as daylight. He was up chamber a good while that day gran'ther was sick, and the old man is most blind anyway and in a doze. He wouldn't have noticed what the doctor was doing there round the bureau."

"Don't talk that way," cried Anne, getting up with fury and flinging herself round the room. "It's vulgar and low. I tell you he's a gentleman, and I'll stake my life on his honesty."

"Now, Anne, you needn't go into hysterics. Didn't he say he was poor that day he came, that he was starved out of Kettletas? I forgot all about it when I saw his nice office furniture, and the horse and carriage that cost him over three hundred dollars. Mebbe he was wee tempted and fell for the first time, and as for his giving me the bill, it was all a mistake. He was in a hurry and forgot himself and pulled out the wrong one. I can't keep him here any longer, Anne. I don't know how to treat him or even how to look him in the face. I must make some excuse to get him out of the house."

Anne felt it was time to clap on the screws, and exercise the full force of her daughterly authority. "You won't do any such thing, Mother Bissell. You don't mean to ruin his prospects for life. You don't want old Carver and the Widow Harkaway to trumpet this little thing from one end of Littlefield to the other. All that talk about his being starved out of Kettletas was a joke. His mother is traveling in Europe and has means. He told me so himself. I have drawn the hundred dollars saved from my school teachings out of the bank, and you are to pay it on the mortgage. I put it by to get a new cloak and furs next winter, but now I shall make the old things answer. You are to do exactly as I say. You must keep him on here, and act as if nothing had happened, and I'll pledge my life he will clear himself in time. I shall start to-morrow morning on a visit to Uncle Hiram, at Bell's Cove, and if he doesn't clear himself and come out bright and shining like the sun, I will never come back to Littlefield so long as he stays in town."

"But suppose I should speak to him and he should try to lie out of it?" asked Mrs. Bissell, now submissive to her girl's will. "Oh, dear, I did like him so much. I trusted him as if he had been my son, and, Anne, I am so sorry for you."

Anne did not ask why her mother was sorry for her, but she intensified her autocratic tone, knowing that she was well under her thumb. "You must not think of speaking to him, mother. You must treat him exactly as if nothing had happened."

CHAPTER VI.

"They've caught the thief who stole your money.

Anne went off in a hurry by rail next morning, about an hour before Dr. Tibbets came home from the city to find her gone. The house seemed strangely cold and empty and ungenial, and he was glad to be called away to a scarlet fever case at Deadman's Hollow. At tea Mrs. Bissell seemed to have changed into a petrifaction of her former self, the Holmes family had crept back into their inexpressive, flat featured shells, and Miss Carver was furtively watching the scene and drawing her own conclusions about Anne's sudden flight. Evidently the Bissells had discovered something unfavorable to their paragon. She communicated her suspicions to the Widow Harkaway, and they waited impatiently for an explosion that did not come. There were no more jokes at table about the doctor's growing practice, no more fun or life or active sympathy. Without Anne's girlish laughter and bright presence the house had suddenly turned into a vault.

The change in Mrs. Bissell struck cold on the doctor's heart. He suspected that she blamed him for not having traced the stolen money or captured the thief, and speculated as to what further steps he could take to show his zeal. He was under a cloud, and he fell into the way of entering and leaving the house stealthily, shutting himself in his office and smoking more cigars than were good for him. He watched the smoke wreathe up about his head by the hour and Anne's face appear and vanish away, and his blues grew daily of a deeper indigo hue. He noticed as a significant sign that the floral offerings that once adorned his office table had ceased to appear. Once he thought seriously of asking Mrs. Bissell what he had done to forfeit her esteem, and then his pride rebelled, and he concluded to fall into the business attitude of boarder and landlady. He did not even dare to inquire after Anne or when she was coming home, for all his questions were met with polite but frigid discouragement.

He could see that Mrs. Bissell suffered silently, but the loss of her interest money, the shiftlessness of Bissell and the worries of poor help were sufficient to account for her low spirits. Only Miss Carver throve in the changed attitude of affairs. She now firmly believed the doctor was a thief, and that the Bissells had found him out, and for some reason were hushing matters up; but she was willing to indulge in scientific conversation even with a man of his suspicious character, now that she had the field all to herself, and Anne's irritating beauty was no longer beaming on the opposite side of the table. In spite of her belief in his turpitude she was half disposed to go over to the little pill theory, for the doctor was very generous in his medical opinions he gave gratis on her pet diseases. Miss Carver had tried her best to fathom the mystery of Anne's absence and Mrs. Bissell's freezing up toward the doctor, but without very brilliant success.

"They've found out something pretty black about him, you may be sure," she said to the widow, "for I never saw a girl make a bolder push than she did after that man, and they were all just ready to eat him up."

A month had gone by and Mrs. Bissell showed no sign of relenting toward the young doctor. She was more and more polite and formal and ceremonious, and it occurred to her that he would soon be looking out for a fashionable boarding place, where the climate was more salubrious, for the spread of scarlet fever in Deadman's Hollow had given him plenty of hard work, and it was no uncommon thing to have the door bell broken twice a week by the insistency of night messengers. One autumn evening she was sitting in her own room with a great pile of stockings before her, fresh from the wash and awaiting the darning needle, when the doctor burst in without stopping to knock. He held a long official looking document in his hand, and his face was flushed with eager, happy excitement.

"Excuse me, Mrs. Bissell, for forgetting my manners. I hurried in to tell you that I have just had great news from the Boston chief of police. They've caught the thief that stole your money, and got back all those marked bills but one that has mysteriously disappeared. But it is sure to come to light in time."

"What do you say?" Mrs. Bissell asked sharply, clutching the arm of her chair and looking up bewildered through her glasses.

"They've caught the thief," said he, raising his voice with the impression that she had suddenly gone deaf. "He was an old state prison bird, who had just been discharged from the penitentiary. He pretended to be a plumber and roofer by trade, and was engaged here with Fraser early in the summer. He intended, it seems, to clean out Littlefield, but got scared after he had robbed you and left town suddenly."

"Why, that's the very man that pretended to mend my roof!" cried Mrs. Bissell.

"Yes," said the doctor, smiling, "and it seems the fellow took the opportunity to go through your bureau drawers."

A hot flush burned on Mrs. Bissell's thin cheek, and she put her hand before her eyes for very shame. "Oh, doctor," she cried in a stifled, choked voice, broken with sobs, "I ought to go down on my knees and humbly beg your pardon."

The doctor looked startled and mystified.

"What in the world do you mean, Mrs. Bissell?"

She rose slowly and tottered to her closet, and unlocked a little writing desk on the lower shelf and took out the ten dollar bill, and came shamefaced and trembling and laid it on the doctor's knee. He took it up, scrutinized it all over, as Anne had done, and discovered in one corner the faint letter B, with a little cross in blue ink. "Why," said he, astonished, "this is the missing bill. How did you come by it, Mrs. Bissell?"

The color flooded his landlady's thin brown face away up to the roots of her gray hair, and tinged even the tips of her ears. "Don't you know, Dr. Tibbets, you gave it to me for board," she said slowly. "I gave it to you?" He ran his hands through his light locks and sat dumb for a moment, stricken with surprise. Then a light broke in on him. "I see now," he exclaimed. "It was that scoundrel Doyle, whose thief's name is Shifty Mike. He called me in that night for the baby, the first night call I had in Littlefield. I see now it was all a trick to pass this bill off on me and save himself from suspicion, for there really wasn't anything serious the matter with the child. When he offered to pay me I remember at first I thought I could not make change for so large a bill, but finally I did manage, and then I stuffed it into my pocket, and thought no more about it—never looked at it, in fact, until that day I gave it to you."

Mrs. Bissell did not look up. Her face was still scarlet, and she was trembling like a leaf. The doctor rubbed his forehead, still perplexed. "It has just occurred to me," he said, smiling a little wistfully, "that you might have thought—but no, you did not think I was a thief;" his frank, sunny smile broke out all over his face; "the thing is too absurd. You couldn't suppose that I had sneaked up there into the attic and taken your money out of the bureau drawer?"

The poor woman looked so distressed he wanted to spare her. "And Miss Anne," he stammered, "did Miss Anne—could Miss Anne really think I had stolen?" The words choked him and he stopped short.

"No, no," protested Mrs. Bissell, stretching out her hands. "She could never think anything to your injury. She believed you were a perfect gentleman, and as honest and true as the sun. She said she would stake her life on it, and she got down on her knees and made me promise I would never let you know, would never breathe a word to harm you in this town. She knew if it once got wind such as she," motioning toward Miss Carver's room, "would soon tear your reputation piecemeal. She said she'd go away and not come back until you were cleared, as she knew you would be in some way, and the poor girl has been sick waiting, but she never lost faith." Mrs. Bissell paused, and then went on in a low, broken voice, "I was to blame, doctor, and I ask you to forgive me, though I don't know as you ever can, and now I guess I must go and telegraph to Anne to come right home," and she rose from her chair.

"No," said the doctor, quite pale, and putting his hand on her arm. "Let me go to Bell's Cove. I have something to say to Anne. If we come back together to-morrow afternoon we shall come back pledged to each other for life."

"Oh, doctor!" and Mrs. Bissell began to cry. "I always did say you were the only young man I ever should care to have for a son. But we are poor, humble folks, though I will say it for Anne, she's a good girl."

The doctor and Anne came home together the next day, and now Dr. Tibbets has the largest practice in Littlefield. He has paid off the mortgage on the Bissell place, and Bridget O'Neil has been living in the family for several years. The Littlefield people have long ago forgotten that the doctor's wife was ever outside the pale of the best set. Miss Carver has enthusiastically adopted the little pill practice, and now speaks of Mrs. Tibbets as "dearest Anne," implying that she has always lived with her on terms of the closest intimacy.—New York Times.

Cookery at Sea.

The English Shipmasters' association has proposed that a cooking school for ships' cooks should be established. Hitherto the one qualification for the post of cook in the merchant service has been to be a negro. It is true that occasionally a Spaniard or other nationality of exceptionally dark complexion has been shipped as cook, but such exceptions have rarely had the approbation of intelligent seamen. So, too, if the cook has accidentally gone overboard the captain has been compelled to detail the most worthless of the sailors to act as cook; but this has been done of necessity and not of choice. The proposal to establish cooking schools shows that the old fashioned cook, whose only conception of cooking was limited to boiling—or in the case of exceptionally dark cooks, to boiling and frying—is doomed to vanish.

The modern sea captain desires the refinements of shore cookery, and hankers for "mauevilins." Possibly he dreams of game suppers prepared from cooped partridges, and perhaps pudding more recondite than the simple duff of the sea would meet his views. The old fashioned captain is being driven from the ocean by steam, and it is perhaps fitting that the old fashioned cook should follow him. It is even possible that the "tramp" of the future will carry as a cook a young woman who has just graduated from a cookery school and who will ornament the galley with

WHAT IS SIMPEE LIVING?

SOME QUEER NOTIONS ARE HELD ON THIS QUESTION.

Kate Upson Clark Begins a Sensible Article by Telling How One Housewife Who Prided Herself on the "Simplicity" of Her Cooking Fed Her Family.

[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

"We live very simply at our house," said a wealthy woman, somewhat affectedly. "We believe in simple living, and I have brought my family up to practice it."

The lady to whom this remark was addressed was interested to observe the "simple living" which was thus complacently described. She knew that almost every one of the ten members of the large family who were said to live thus "simply" had been very ill during the preceding three or four years. They had suffered variously from erysipelas, spinal meningitis, nervous prostration, typhoid and other fevers, and quinsy and diphtheretic sore throats. She did not believe that such diseases could exist where genuine "simple living" was practiced.

She found that the food in this family was very generally fried—that fried oysters, croquettes, Lyonnaise and Saratoga potatoes, griddle cakes and similar dishes, with always hot bread in some form and coffee for all members of the family, from the youngest child, a girl of six, to the father and mother—were the rule for breakfast. She found that cereals were seldom served there. They "hated" them, as was natural for palates accustomed to highly seasoned fried food. Neither was fruit popular there.

She found that the young men and women of the family, even to the school children of from fourteen to eighteen, were in the habit of sitting up until midnight, often later, and then retiring to sleeping rooms which were furnace heated and into which, with one or two honorable exceptions, no breath of the outside air was allowed to penetrate. These exceptions had learned, the mother declared, "cranky" notions while away at college and boarding school. Most of these young people had been obliged to leave school early in life, because their "health" would not permit them to study.

She found that the girls of the family wore corsets at the age of eleven, and that the pretty, doll faced daughter of eighteen, with a bust measure of thirty-six, after she had been subjected to the manipulation of the dressmaker, had a waist twenty-one inches round, like thousands of other girls who "never laced in their lives."

She found that the boys of the family—the younger ones surreptitiously, the older ones openly—had smoked cigarettes from the time they were eight or nine years old. She found that the girls, beyond making their own beds and doing a little of their personal mending, never exerted themselves to do any wholesome work; that they and all the children were allowed to take hot baths as often as they liked, and to stay in them as long as they liked; that all were free to go to the pantry whenever they felt like it, and that only the richest cake was ever locked away from them, while an abundance of doughnuts, cookies and ordinary cake was always at their disposal; that it was impossible to keep them supplied with pickles, "the children all liked them so much;" that while the boys wore heavy underflannels during the severe weather, the girls "wouldn't," because such underclothing made their waists and arms look so large; that neither the mother nor the two elder daughters—although the former was suffering from a chronic disease and the two latter had had several severe illnesses and were always very delicate—ever rested during the daytime unless they had been "up late" at an entertainment the evening before. "They had no time to waste in lying down," the mother declared, with constantly increasing complacence as she rehearsed her way of doing things; she "had always brought her daughters up to be busy—it didn't make much difference what about—but to be busy about something."

Two of the girls were really very fond of reading, but the books which they selected were such as they would far better have left alone. They often read themselves to sleep at night, the mother assured her horrified visitor proudly, and not infrequently "the gas would be found in their rooms burning brightly at 3 or 4 in the morning, when they had fallen asleep before they knew it! Such a joke on them!"

This wealthy and misguided dame is not the only one who imagines that she is "living simply" when she is living after a manner as far as possible removed from that ideal standard. Many a comparatively poor family, too, fancy that they are "living simply" when they are in reality almost as far from it as in the case cited. In fact there seems to be a general lack of understanding in the popular mind as to what "simple living" is. Yet everybody seems to approve of it and to feel that it, and it alone, leads to health and genuine comfort. It is worth while to try and get at a proper definition of a term which seems to be so widely misunderstood.

Undoubtedly our pioneer forefathers enjoyed something akin to the "simple living" which we want. We need to "backslide," after Mr. Ruskin's definition of backsliding. "On the ways most of us go," says that fiery apostle of simplicity, "the faster we slide back, the better. Slide back into the cradle, if going on is to the grave—back, I tell you, back, out of your long faces and into your long clothes."

An old proverb says:

Sunrise, breakfast; sunhigh, dinner;
Sundown, sup, makes a saint of a sinner.

The dwellers in cities cannot well adjust their meals to the simple hours of our forefathers; but they can and should see that their children's meals are thus adjusted; and we can also see that they are of proper food. But what is truly "simple" food?

There are three "simple" modes of cooking. They are baking or roasting, broiling and boiling. Some of the customs and utensils of our estimable forefathers and foremothers, even Mr. Ruskin would hardly advise our "sliding back" to. Among these are frying and the frying pan. The latter should be banished from the modern kitchen, titillating though its products be to the untaught palate.

The simplest form of food is fruit. An abundance of ripe fruit should be supplied to every family, whatever other expense has to be curtailed to procure it. The most uniformly healthful households are those where fruit is judiciously eaten daily.

The simplest form of living is the regular diurnal routine. Old George Herbert says:

Slight those who say amidst their sickly healths,
"Thou liv'st by rule." What doth not so but man?
Houses are built by rule, and commonwealths.
Entice the trusty sun, if that you can,
From his ecliptic line; beckon the sky.
Who lives by rule then keeps good company.

Without being castiron in one's habits, it is possible, and it is the only safe and prudent way, to "live by rule." That means rise, breakfast, dine, sup and retire at as nearly the same hours every day as you can. Cleanse your body both inside and out with regularity. Clothe yourself uniformly at the same season. It is risky in the extreme to go out in furs in the morning and then to drive to an entertainment in the evening with a light opera cloak thrown over bare neck and shoulders.

The simplest form of living is in the open air. Get all the fresh air, therefore, that you can. Go out to walk in it every day. Ventilate every room in your house every morning. Never sleep, unless except in the most bitter weather, without an abundance of fresh air in your chamber. Wear flannel night gowns, night caps and mufflers if necessary, and, while using "comfortables" no more than you are compelled to, do not be afraid to employ plenty of blankets and down quilts. Do not sleep in a draught, unless heroically protected, and do allow heat to radiate from your furnace throughout the house if you want it; but insist upon having in abundance also, that rarest boon of the modern dwelling house, fresh air.

Let your clothing be plain, warm, light and loose. There is no foe to simple living like the clothes fiend. It introduces all sorts of ghastly complications into our modern life. Dress for the weather without regard to the calendar. Refuse to carry, at the behest of a fashionable dressmaker, several pounds more of linings and draperies and jet trimming than you need to. Give every organ of your body room to do its simple duty. A restricted circulation, and vital organs misplaced and tightly pressed by the vicious system of dress now in vogue are at the bottom of two-thirds of the horrible, nameless diseases of women.

The praise of simplicity is in all men's mouths, but, as with many another virtue, its praise and its practice are two very different things. Many have fallen into inconsistency in this regard from ignorance; yet even for those who understand it—that "first step in nature and last in art"—its pursuit, under the unfavorable conditions of modern life, is sufficiently difficult. In "simple living," however, lie the germs of true and and abiding happiness.

What Asafetida Is.

Asafetida is a gum derived from the root of a plant which grows in Persia, Afghanistan and other parts of Asia. The root is cut, and a thick, milky juice exudes, which, when dried, gives the asafetida of commerce. The overpowering, offensive smell is due to a volatile oil, which can be removed by dissolving the gum in alcohol and distilling the compound. Disagreeable as it is to western olfactories, in Persia and many parts of the east it is used as a condiment for food.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Gardening, piano tuning and sanitary engineering are some of the occupations women are taking up in Great Britain. A school of gardening will be opened in May.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

As a rule the county papers are agin' it—the bonding scheme.

C. W. Mead went to Wahpeton Monday night, where he took a team for the home of his parents. He had received word that his sister was very ill with quick consumption. Mrs. Mead and children accompanied him.

Going south on the N. P. one is struck with the fine appearance of crops. There is no poor grain this year.

We doubt if the Fisher Bulletin or Thief River Falls Press represent the people in their districts on the bond question.

The severe illness of Mrs. O. M. Holmes, at Minneapolis, is lamented by all who knew that estimable lady. Her illness is such that her physician has no hopes for her permanent recovery.

Louis La Bissoniere returned to Minneapolis Friday night. Louis says he enjoyed his visit here ever so much. He has a good position in a commission house there.

Mrs. Carl Kretzschmar and children arrived Friday morning, taking a team the same day for Thief River Falls.

The bond scheme is knocked flat in the head unless the line is definitely located through the important points of the county—and then it may fail.

Geo Smith took the train for Litchfield Friday evening. Geo. will remain a week visiting at his old home.

Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Lamb, of West Duluth, friends of Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Marshall, arrived Monday morning on a visit. Mr. Lamb is a prominent attorney of the Duluth district.

The following parties went to Fertile Friday night: Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Marshall, Mrs. F. E. Hunt, Mrs. J. A. Duffy, Misses Mollie Duffy, Maria Lavik, Emma and Ettie Zaiser, Messrs. L. A. Kaufer, Helmuth Zaiser, Phil. A. Kaufer.

Red Lake Falls wants fair play in this D. & D. matter. She is backed by eastern Polk county.

P. D. Couture has a very desirable position with Michaud Bros. in St. Paul, as book-keeper. P. D. is a capable man and his friends here are pleased to see his talents appreciated.

Miss Martha Riechel completed her contract with the Badger school and returned home Friday.

Fertile has a good string band.

Mrs W. A. Schreiter and children returned Friday morning.

Mrs. Jos. Smith and children went to Detroit Lake Friday evening, where they will spend a couple of weeks.

It don't seem possible that a county would vote a huge debt upon itself for the apparent reason of securing a road to Crookston.

The judges of election here have written to Crookston for a challenger who is in favor of bonding the county for the D. & D. They fail to find one man here in favor of the measure, and as the law requires that a representative of each party be at the polls, they find it necessary to borrow a man from Crookston, where there are plenty such specimens as they lack.

* * *

Nick Helm purchased 3 lots on north Hamilton ave. He will move the little building near Jos. Helm's residence to this property and fix up a home there.

Freeman Fletcher has been clearing the lots north of Helm's. The Fletcher residence will shortly be moved to this property.

The council failed to take action in the matter of improving the road to Red Lake, the business men still slumber on, and the traffic seeks another route.

H. J. Kaufer's barber shop is now located on 7th st in St. Paul.

These evenings the rivers teem with men and boys bathing.

We printed several extra copies last week—three, we think—to meet the demand which we thought would result from the publication of certain articles, but find we overestimated the thing.

The Devils Lake region seems fated. A hail storm destroyed thousands of acres of grain there Monday.

Mrs. Fred Buse returned Tuesday morning.

Adolph Zaiser is at Ulen working on the new elevator.

Several of the Gamache boys have returned.

Harvest will begin in a few days.

Proprietors of threshing engines are busy getting ready for the season's work.

Frank E. Hunt is getting in his stock of hardware, and fixing up the store room. It will make a neat store.

Adam Zeh returned from West Superior yesterday morning. He will visit here a couple of weeks.

Moes Verboncer is the marshal.

FRANK E. HUNT, P. M.

A cablegram announces that Amelie Rives has sailed for the United States where she will arrive soon after the appearance of her latest novel in the August numder of the Cosmopolitan. After nearly two years of silence the new story will be received with the greatest interest by those who enjoyed her earlier work. Married, traveled, and in every way matured, her latest production is said to be worthy of the talent which gave such great promise. The scene is laid in Paris, where the author has been for two years, and the heroine is a Virginia girl who has been studying music abroad with a negro servant as chaperone. The story has been illustrated by Kate Greatorex, one of the most promising of American painters in Paris, and a charming portrait of Miss Rives is the frontispiece of the magazine.

The D. & D. schemers find it rather discouraging, after interviewing the farmers, in the matter of bonding the county. The Duluth & Winnipeg, the father of the unnatural offspring, the D. & D., have been endeavoring by corrupt methods to rob the people of millions of acres of land. They have spent so much money in this way that their credit is exhausted.

The Minneapolis Journal says: The largely increased sales of farm lands at advanced prices by the state auditor; the big sales of the Great Northern railroad, the reports of private sales from the whole state, seem to show that in Minnesota and the Dakotas the farm land boom has set in strongly, with the excellent feature that the magnificent crops of this season are inducing the purchasers to settle on the lands. In northwestern Iowa long neglected wild lands are selling at $20 an acre. This widely extended purchase of farm lands is one of the strongest indications of returning prosperity. It is full of promise to city realty, for experience has proved that interest in city property sooner or later follows a revival of interest in wild land.

Wm. E. Wilber is back from Red Lake.

The C. S. C. meet with Miss Brady at 2 p. m. Thursday next.

Geo. Bottineau returned from Minneapolis Tuesday morning.

A private letter from Rev. Peter B. Champagne, who is now in Oregon, states that he is just starting on a trip to the Pacific coast states, after which he will return to Canada. Father Champagne has many friends here who will wish him every good fortune.

A lady has written a recipe for cooking husbands so as to make them tender and good; it is as follows: In buying your husband do not be guided by the silvery appearance, as in buying mackerel, nor by the golden tint, as if you wanted salmon. Be sure and select him yourself, as tastes differ. Do not go to market for him as the best are always brought to your door. It is far better to have none unless you will patiently learn how to cook him. A preserving kettle of the finest porcelain is best, but, if you have nothing but an earthenware pipkin it will do with care. See that the linen in which you wrap him is nicely washed and mended, with the required number of buttons and strings neatly sewn on. Tie him in the kettle by a strong silk thread called comfort, as the one called duty is apt to be weak; they are apt to fly out of the kettle and be burned, and crusted on the edges, since, like crabs and lobsters, you have to cook them while alive. Make a clear, steady fire out of love, neatness and cheerfulness. Set him as near this as seems to agree with him. If he sputters and frizzes, do not be anxious; some husbands do this until they are quite done. Add a little sugar in the form of what confectioners call kisses, but no vinegar or pepper on any account. Do not stick any sharp instrument in him to see if he is becoming tender. Stir him gently; watch the while, lest he lie too flat and close to the kettle, and become useless. You cannot fail to know when he is done. If thus treated, you will find him very digestible, agreeing nicely with you and the children; and he will keep as long as you want, unless you become careless and set him in too cool a place.—Once a Week.

Mrs. Dr. I. Lemieux entertained friends at tea Thursday last, when a very enjoyable time was had.

Charity

When you meet with one suspected
Of some secret deed of shame,
And for this by all rejected
As a thing of evil fame;
Guard thine every look and action,
Speak no word of heartless blame,
For the slanderer's vile detraction
Yet may soil thy goodly name,

When you meet with one pursuing
Ways the lost have entered in,
Working out his own undoing
With his recklessness and sin;
Think, if placed in his condition,
Would a kind word be in vain?
Or a look of cold suspicion
Win thee back to truth again?

There are spots that bear no flowers,
Not because the soil is bad,
But the summer's genial showers
Never make their bosoms glad;
Better have an act that's kindly,
Treated sometimes with disdain,
Than, by judging others blindly,
Doom the innocent to pain,

Who mean to attend the National encampment at Detroit in August, should take notice that "The Burlington" is the only line from Minneapolis and St. Paul via Chicago over which tickets for the Encampment can be purchased at reduced rates. For further particulars as to rates, dates, etc., call on your nearest agent, or address W. J. C. Kenyon, G. P. A., St. Paul Minn.

Good Looks.

Good looks are more than skin deep, depending upon a healthy condition of all the vital organs. If the Liver be inactive, you have a Bilious Look, if your stomache be disordered you have a Dyspeptic Look and if your Kidney be affected you have a Pinched Look. Secure good health and you will have good looks. Electric bitters is the great alterative and Tonic acts directly on the vital organs. Cures Pimples, Blotches, Boils and gives a good complexion. Sold at W. A. Schreiters Drug store, 50c. per bottle.

Guaranteed Cure for La Grippe.

We authorize our advertised druggist to sell you Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds, upon this condition. If you are afflicted with La Grippe and will use this remedy according to directions, giving it a fair trial, and experience no benefit, you may return the bottle and have your money refunded. We make the offer, because of the wonderful success of Dr. King's New Discovery during last season's epidemic. Have heard of no case in which it failed. Try it. Trial bottle free at W. A. Schreiters Drug store. Large size 50c. $1.00

Ode to the Banana Peel.

The street car had passed, but to catch
it he redoned,
So he ran like a deer, and shouted and beckoned,
Till he planted his heel
On a smooth bit of peel—
Then he saw half a million of stars in a second.

He was in to great a hurry; better have waited for another car. This business of running after street cars is risky, and undignified too. The safest and most comfortable mode of travel is by the regular trains of the railroad, provided always that you select such a first class line as "The Burlington." Its trains leave from and arrive at all the principal cities and towns in the West promptly on time, and if your watch runs correctly, you need never run to catch a train. Its time system for the running of its trains is perfect, and its equipment of free reclining chair cars, Pullman vestibuled sleepers, and peerless dining cars, is unequalled by any other line. For tickets, time tables, maps, etc., call on your local ticket agent, or address W. J. C. Kenyon Gen. Pass. Agent "The Burlington," St. Paul, Minn.

Stephen Sprague's office is now above the P. O.

Miss Eugenie Le Freniere is again at home, to the delight of her many friends.

Gotthart Harren and Joseph Buttweiler of Free Port, Minn. have been visiting Peter Harren this week. These gentlemen are both well pleased with our present prosperity.

A specimen typographical error last week made one of Flack's locals read "handsome clerks" instead of handsome "clocks." W. J. objects to having his beauty advertised; however, his clocks are up to the standard.

YOUTH.

The hoary years renew their youth
In tender flushes, roseate hues,
And winter weeps away her frost
In early rains and fragrant dews.

We cannot, if we would forget
The early rapture of life's spring—
Those quick pulsations stir again
When swallows are upon the wing.

And youth, with summer in her veins,
In sweet accord with earth and skies—
A harp by viewless fingers stirred—
Is one with nature's harmonies.

The hoary years renew their youth,
And strains prophetic fall as dew
Upon the fair, awakened earth—
"Behold, I will make all things new!"

TALK ON POSSUM RIDGE.

Possum Ridge society had no social distinctions to speak of. and though the members of the wealthier families may have held their noses just a mite elevated over their less fortunate neighbors, whatever there is in the way of amusement, be it corn husking, log rolling, wool picking, hog killing or quilting, everybody was eligible to attend, from the post-master and his wife down to Sam Gilley and his wife.

So it followed as a matter of course that when, one day, Mrs. Hawkins sent little Tommie around to invite the neighbor women to a wool picking on the morrow, they all gladly accepted and came, for Mrs Hawkins was an estimable lady, well worthy of assistance; and, besides, they all knew that she made it a point to serve an excellent dinner on such occasions.

When the hands of Hawkins' old clock pointed to the hour of 10 at least thirty women were seated around Hawkins' best room, all busily engaged in picking burrs out of the wool, and faults out of other peoples characters. Of course, such important matters and branches of industry as garden and soap making, and early chicken hatching were discussed and disposed of the first thing, after which came items of neighboring news and gossip.

Just at that time the Ridge people were in a state of considerable agitation regarding the new teacher who had lately come to "take up" the summer school, and who was boarding down at the Widow Martin's. The widow Martin was herself a comparatively new comer, and though she and Jane, her 18-year-old daughter, had been the theme of conversation at two or three of these social gatherings, they had not been entirely disposed of, and were still good for several hours' consideration in committees of the whole.

"Hev any uv ye ever seen the new teacher?" Surilda Smith asked in a sharp voice, when there came a little lull in the hum of conversation.

"Law, yes," Partheny Perkins replied. "He passes right by our house every day, and once he said 'good mornin' to me," and Partheny tossed her head up with the air of one who knows she has a great advantage, and duly appreciates its importance. The others acknowledged, by their looks and actions, that they realized Partheny's advantage over themselves, and were willing to accord her the post of honor, though they did envy her so much good fortune.

"They say he's rale han'some," Surilda went on, "an' dresses up to beat anything."

"Yes, he is good lookin'," Parthena admitted, "an' he does wear mighty good clothes, but I don't think he nigh so han'som as my cousin Lige, who clerks in the store over at the Forks, an' I know he don't wear nigh as good clothes."

"They say," put in Tilda Brown, a sour tempered, sharp nosed maiden lady of doubtful age, "that he is mighty sweet to Jane Martin, though why he should be is more than I kin tell, when there air so many young ladies as would make better wives," and Miss Tilda showed unmistakably, by her manner of expression, that she considered herself the most eligible young lady on the Ridge.

"Well, they may say what they please," said Sally Huff, who was the mother of two daughters who had been a long time on the matrimonial market with no takers. "They may say what they please, but I'll warrant that teacher never marries Jane Martin."

"I think Mis' Huff's right," said Surilda, "an' ef he is payin' her any 'tentions' he's jist a-doin' of it to make a fool of her. That's my erpinion, anyhow, an' I don't think time'll gainsay it."

"I dar' say, S'rildy. It is plain to my mind that a young man hevin' had ther advantages he's had, wouldn't go to payin' serious attentions to a gal no more likely nor Jane, when they's so many all erroun' here, that he might take his pick an' choice."

Parthena's little black eyes snapped in a way that said she meant more than she spoke, for she was a marriageable widow, and looked with no great favor on the ancient maidens who came in as rivals. Tilda Brown understood Parthena's meaning, and straightening up with an air of offended dignity she snapped back:

"An' it might be added that if none of the young ladies didn't come up to his standard he might go further, an' find a widder to his likin'."

"Now, come," commanded Surilda, "we hain't a-goin' to have no bad feelin's stirred up ermong us, so you two had as well quiet down. No matter who the teacher may or may not marry it's plain to me that he don't never intend to marry Jane Martin; an' that he's jest makin' a fool of her, an' it ought not to be allowed."

"I'm o' your min' Surilda," Mrs. Hawkins said, coming in with a batch of dough in her hands, to have a word in the talk. "Only last night as Absalom was comin' home from the mill he sees the teacher an' Jane a-promenadin' in the orchard, an' she was a-holdin' to his arm, an' a-smilin' in his face jest as lovin' as could be. Then he sees them stop an' the teacher breaks off some apple blossoms an' fastens them in her hair, an' then he stoops an' kisses her. An' she didn't seem to mind it one bit, but just laughed at it, 'stid o' haulin' off an' slappin' him over, as she ought to a done."

Up went thirty pairs of hands and thirty mouths ejaculated, "Oh!"

"Wal, it ain't no more'n I'spected," Parthena said, when she had sufficiently recovered from the terrible shock to be able to speak. "It's a dretful state o' things an' shouldn't never be allowed to go on."

"That it shouldn't," said Tilda, "fer it it is, what's ever to become of us innocent young ladies? I say it ought to be stopped."

"Yes, it ought, an' it's our duty to see that it is stopped. We owe it to the pertection of innocent young gals, an' we mustn't be ateerd to do our duty."

"Can't nobody say that Parthena Perkins ever shunned her duty," Parthena said, with a derisive nod of her small round head, "an' if there is anything I do love to do better,n anything else it is to p'int out to people their failin's an' help 'em to git right."

"I can say the same," chimed in Mrs. Huff, "an' I'm ready to go this minute to do what's best toward Jane Martin. I know that something ought to be done."

"An' me, too," Surilda said; "but I'm not settled in my own mind how'd be best to perceed."

"Wal," Mrs. Hawkins remarked thoughtfully, "I reckon as good a way as any would be to see Mis' Martin an' talk to her about it. She's a curious sort o' critter, an' flares up monstrous bad when anybody goes to talkin' to her about her failin's, but I reckon we oughtn't ter mind that so long as we feel easy in our own souls, an' know we're doin' it fer her own good."

"She's powerful ungrateful, though" Parthena said, "fer I remember the time a committee of us went to see her an' p'int out to her that she was committin' uv a sin by not 'tendin' up to church, an' she flares right up an, says as how she knows her own business, an' thinks it ain't much worse to stay away from meetin' than it is to go pokin' erbout meddlin' with things that don't consarn us."

"She was mighty frien'ly an' mild, though," Surilda commented, "till we teched on the thing we'd come fer."

"Yes, she wus. But that ain't neither here nor there. We must do somethin', an' as there ain't nothin' better to do, s'pose we p'int a committee to wait on Mis' Martin, an' warn her o' the way Jane's carryin' on with the new teacher, an' tell her she'd best turn him off an' let him hunt another boardin' place."

This proposition was agreed to unanimously, and, accordinly, after considerable further exchange of ideas, Surilda, Parthena and Mrs. Gilley were selected as a committee to wait on poor Mrs. Martin,

The next day was selected as the time for the committee to make their visit, for, as Mrs. Huff said, "there wasn't no time ter waste."

Accordingly, at an early hour the next morning, Parthena and Mrs. Gilley met Surilda at her own house, and together the three ladies started out on their mission of kindness and mercy. As they passed the Hawkins place Mrs. Hawkins came out and Mrs. Gilley stopped for a few words with her, while Surilda and Perthena walked leisurely on. They were no sooner out of hearing of Mrs. Gilley than Parthena said:

"I wish they'd left Mis. Gilley outten the committee. I don't feel jest right a-goin' along with sich as her to talk to other folks about their shortcomings, do you, Surildy?"

"No, I don't fer ever'body knows that Sam Gilley ain't worth killin'; asides a man as sells as many sheepskins as he does 'thout even ownin' a sheep, don't 'pear to me to be strictly honest, an' it might 'pear to Mis Martin as how we're mighty hard off fer fittin' women to serve on a committee when sich likes as her is chosen."

Just then Mrs. Gilley came up, and the subject was changed; as the lady walked on, they chatted as pleasantly as three honest souls ever did.

Mrs. Martin received them graciously, and invited them into the "best room," which was quite a dignity. Parthena was selected as spokeswoman, and after a few commonplace remarks she came to the point by saying:

"Mis' Martin, we've come on an errand of mercy an' hope you won't feel cut up about nothin' we say, fer its all fer the best an' fer your own good. Yistiday, up to Mis' Hawkins' wool pickin,' we fell to talkin' o' this an' that, an' then we got to speakin' of ther new teacher, an' one thing led to another till, finally, it came out that your darter wusn't behavin' jist right toward him, an' that people wus havin' room to talk, even if nothin' bad wusn't meant, so we thought you ought to know, an' we've come as er committee to warn you to be on yer guard."

"Do I understand you to say that people are liable to talk about Jane's conduct toward Robert?"

"That's what I tried to say, Mis' Martin. You know he hasn't been here long an' they ain't enough acquainted to be so intimate."

"No, he hasn't been here long and neither have we, but you are mistaken if you think Jane is not acquainted tolerably well with her own brother," and Mrs. Martin looked at the lady with eyes that twinkled with merriment and exultation, while the committee stared with open mouths and felt smaller and smaller every moment. At last Surilda got command of her tongue long enouth to grasp out:

"Her brother?"

"Yes, he is her brother."

"But his name is different," Parthena protested.

"That's natural enough, isn't it, when he is my son by a former marriage?"

The committee waited for no more words, but rose to adjourn without delay, and as they trudged homeward they were as quiet as lambs, and not a sound broke from their lips; and though they said nothing, each of them felt terribly like blaming the whole business on the others. If there had been a convenient auger hole somewhere about, it is probable that they might have attempted crawling into it.—Yankee Blade.

The Sale Was Off.

From the Kansas City Times.

Mr. Hillard, a tea salesman from Boston, told a very good story at the Coates House the other night. "There was an old chap from away back in Vermont," he said, "who came up to town to make some purchases, chief among them was a big bill of goods from my house. He bought about $300 worth of oolongs, young hysons, English breakfasts, etc. While the goods were being put up, I undertook to show him through the house, and in the course of our wanderings we came to a speaking tube. This was a marvel to Mr. Vermonter, and I had to explain to him how it was we could speak from the sixth floor, on which we were at the time, to a man on the first floor. To illustrate my words I called up our shipping clerk and asked him:

"Have you put up those goods for Mr. Vermonter?" and with this I slipped from the tube and put it to the ear of my customer. The result was not what I anticipated.

"Much obliged, sir, you can cancel my order,' said he to me.

"'What's the matter?" says I.

"'Oh, nuthin,' says he, and off he started for the elevator.

"'What did you say just now?" I asked the shipping clerk in haste.

"I said I am waiting for an answer from Bradstreet's on him; I understand he if a slippery old cuss and needs watching.'"

Queen Victoria's Old Age.

Queen Victoria at the age of 71 is a very plain old lady, and she was by no means good looking some thirty years ago, while she was still in the prime of life. She suffered a great deal from attacks of erysipelas, which reddened and coarsened her skin. She lost her teeth very early in life, owning to the use of a camphorated dentifrice to which she took a great fancy and which proved most pernicious. But from her accession at the age of 18 till she was 25 or 26 the queen was a very pretty young woman, fresh and fair, with soft blue eyes, a small rosy mouth and the loveliest arms and shoulders imaginable. Her lack of height was always a great drawback, and was the cause of her delighting in giving grand fancy costume balls, at which she was wont to appear in a court toilet of the Eighteenth century, the high heeled shoes which must perforce be worn with such a dress lending a very becoming addition to her stature.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

No Place Like Home.

"Where shall we go this summer, dear?" asked Mrs. Flyaway.

"Well, let's see," replied her husband; "last winter we got malaria in Florida?"

"Yes, and the aligators got your pointer dog."

"And the preceding summer we got rheumatism in the mountains?"

We did, and the bears got my little skye terrier."

"And the Summer before that we went to the seashore and got bled by the mosquitoes and the landlord?"

"Yes."

"And the Summer before that we went into the country, and the children were laid up all Summer with ivy poison?"

"I remember."

"Well, if I felt as strong as I used to I'd like first rate to take a vacation this Summer; but I'm feeling kind of weak and listless, and I'm afraid I couldn't stand it. Let's stay at home and rest."

A Nice Question.

The Boston purists have broken loose again and are protesting vigorously against the term "artificial ice." They assert that the product of the ice-making machines is "ice"—neither "artificial" nor "immitation" ice. Guess they are about right; yet how is the stuff to be distinguished by name from "natural ice"? The term "machine ice" seem to meet the case, for "manufactured ice" would apply equally to that produced by human agency or by natural process. It will be a cold day when Boston finds nothing to carp at.—Newark News.

A FIGHT FOR LIFE.

Shall We Drive Slow Poison From Our Breakfast Table?

ALUM AND AMMONIA IN OUR BREAD.

A nuisance that troubled England fifty years ago is now rapidly spreading in this country, that is putting Alum in the bread we eat. This question is causing a great deal of discussion at the present moment, as it is revealed that alum is being used as a substitute for cream of tartar in baking powders. A story is told that a very large percentage of the baking powders sold on the market contain either alum or ammonia, and many of them contain both these pernicious drugs. Much timely alarm is felt at the wholesale use of alum in bread, biscuit and pastry. To young children, growing girls, persons of weakly frame alum bread eaten morning noon and evening is the most harmful. It is the small quantities taken at every meal that do the mischief. Alum is cheap, costing but two or three cents a pound while cream of tartar costs 30c, and the high price of cream of tartar has led cheap baking powder to be made of alum. If the reader wants to know something of the corrosive qualities of alum let him touch a piece to his tongue then reflect how it acts on the tender delicate coats of the stomach.

Following is a list compiled by the Scientific American, of the alum and ammonia baking powders that have already been tested.

Toys That Were Once Postage Stamps.

Seven little red Indians and five blue Quakers were exposed for sale recently among other curiosities on a stand near the city Post Office. There were also three green Africans, whose nationality was proclaimed by the banjos they held. No explanation was given as to why this trio was of the color mentioned, though their complexion was supposed to have been affected by overindulgence in the surreptitious moonlight watermelon. One could buy any one of the small statuettes for 10 cents, notwithstanding the paper plasters they bore stating their "estimated value" at from $50 to $200 each." The secret of it was that they were made out of macerated postage stamps. The Quakers were of 1-cent stamps, the Indians 2-cent ones, and the colored persons of 10-cent denomination. It was learned by the Star writer, upon investigation, that the material of which they were composed had been purchased at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Postmaster-General Wanamaker has the use of a macerator at the establishment one day in each week to destroy his spoiled but unused stamps. —Washington Star.

A Peculiar Natural Phenomenon.

A curious phenomenon occurred Monday evening in the upper part of the city. About 10 o'clock the almost perfectly clear atmosphere gave way to sublime-like fog, which settled down very suddenly in a distinct and seemingly solid stratum. The descent was rapid, and every portion of the cloud of vapor reached the earth at the same instant. The phenomenon continued only about five minutes, when the body disappeared heavenward as rapidly as it had descended.—Albany Argus.

A DRAUGHTSMAN'S DILEMMA.

It Was Only Solved When He Had Froze the Other Ear.

In the office of a prominent architect in Chicago one of the draughtsmen is a young man who has lately come here from Troy, N. Y. He lives at a pension on Wabash Avenue. The other evening, during the recent cold snap, he had occasion to escort a young lady to her home on Thirty-fifth Street, and, as affairs with them had reached the stage where it is pleasant to be alone together, they walked. The girl was well bundled up, but the young man was not dressed for extremely cold weather, and when they reached their destination he found that his left ear was frozen stiff. The next day he appeared at the office with his ear poulticed and bandaged. His employer noticed his condition and remarked upon the extraordinary devotion to duty he displayed. The young man was greatly pleased, and for five minutes quite forgot the pain. After he had been at work for an hour or so he found that his head was irresistibly pulled sideways by the weight of the bandage, and that it was impossible to keep it squarely on his shoulders. But he went on with his work.

Next morning his employer was anything but gracious and informed him that all of the previous day's labor would have to be done over again, for the lines were out of drawing and the houses leaned perceptibly to the northwest. The young man attempted to draw the front elevation of a house that wouldn't look as if it had been drinking, but found that he could not draw a perpendicular line and that the horizontal line would not lie flat. He couldn't account for this phenomenon until one of his fellows suggested that the bandage on his left ear which pulled his head over toward his left shoulder, was the cause of it. The young man thought the explanation plausible. What did he do? Did he lie off until his ear got well? No. That evening he called upon the young lady, induced her to go out for a walk, and left his right ear exposed to the chilling blast. When he reached home he found that he had accomplished his purpose, and that the other ear was frozen as hard as a rock. After that he had no difficulty with his houses.—Chicago Post.

WRITING IN THE BLUES.

One Author Finds Mental Depression Conducive to Good Work.

"It is curious," says a writer of long experience, "but my best work has been done in periods of great mental depression. Do I get 'blue' and 'low spirited' the product of my pen, accompanied, perhaps, with difficulty, invariably stands a higher test than my normal efforts. A corresponding elation acts precisely opposite with me. When I am excited and enthusiastic and can talk fluently, the words tangle on paper and my thoughts refuse to be held in the bondage of pen and ink."

It must be said this is certainly not the average experience of writers. Most "copy" producers will testify that ups and downs are not reliable agents upon which to depend. There is nothing after all like the condition involved by the commonplaces—sound sleep, good digestion, a light breakfast and a stub pen.—New York Times.

Wants White Beaver to Return.

The La Crosse Chronicle, the leading newspaper in western Wisconsin, deeply deplores (editorially) the removal of White Beaver (Dr. Frank Powell) to St. Paul, and hopes that he will 'ere long, return to the "Gate-way City" where he has "so successfully treated multitudes of sick women and thousands of nervous men."

"August Flower"

Mrs. Sarah M. Black of Seneca, Mo., during the past two years has been affected with Neuralgia of the Head, Stomach and Womb, and writes: "My food did not seem to strengthen me at all and my appetite was very variable. My face was yellow, my head dull, and I had such pains in my left side. In the morning when I got up I would have a flow of mucus in the mouth, and a bad, bitter taste. Sometimes my breath became short, and I had such queer, tumbling, palpitating sensations around the heart. I ached all day under the shoulder blades, in the left side, and down the back of my limbs. It seemed to be worse in the wet, cold weather of Winter and Spring; and whenever the spells came on, my feet and hands would turn cold, and I could get no sleep at all. I tried everywhere. and got no relief before using August Flower Then the change came. It has done me a wonderful deal of good during the time I have taken it and is working a complete cure." ③

A BILL TO MUZZLE.

What the San Francisco "Examiner" Thinks of a Recently Enacted Law—Question of State Rights.

The United States Sepreme Court Will Be Asked to Pass Upon the Constitutionality of the Measure—A Careful Review of the Matter.

The supreme court of the United States will, during its fall term, hand down a decision in the case of George W. Dupre, one of the publishers of the New Orleans States, a leading daily newspaper of that city, which probably involves a greater number of important legal propositions than were ever presented for the consideration of that tribunal.

The San Francisco Examiner regrets that these questions should come up on what many may carelessly view as a side issue. Mr. Dupre, relying upon the unconstitutionality of what is known as the lottery act and having chosen to ignore its provisions, for which he was duly—and, as he thinks unlawfully—called to account, is now seeking the relief guaranteed by the constitution in such a case.

To Mr. Dupre, therefore, it is not a side issue, but all important, as indeed must be such an issue to every citizen which involves individual freedom, the rights of a sovereign state and the liberty of the press.

The most cursory examination of the provisions of this act, entitled "An act to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes relating to lotteries and for other purposes," demonstrates the appropriateness of its title. It is an act "for other purposes," and very many other purposes indeed. The avowed object of the statute is to break up the business of the Louisiana State Lottery company, and if the framers of this new and certainly unprecedented legislation had sought to do this directly, honestly and fairly, there could not be any reasonable objection to the character of the attempt. The worst that could have been said of such legislation is that it was nugatory. "You shan't run a lottery," Uncle Sam would cry, to which Louisiana would not unnaturally reply, "I shall." And here the matter would rest until Louisiana was ready, of her own accord, to agree with her sister states.

For there is no principle of law better established than that the general government has no power to declare any acts committed within the borders of a sovereign state other than those which are committed in direct contravention of the special powers lodged by the constitution in the general government.

It is for the state exclusively, to declare what is lawful or unlawful in the way of lotteries just as it is its prerogative to establish high license or prohibition or to enforce, as the case may be, a Sunday law.

The framers of the statute knew this perfectly well, and they have attempted to do by indirection what they have no right to do at all. They have sought to lodge in the postoffice department, powers wholly superior to the constitution, the law of the land and the proper tribunals for its enforcement. But the statute goes even further; it expressly authorizes the pettiest postmaster, nay, eggs him on, to commit acts which would, without the protection of the statute, constitute offenses of the gravest and most inexcusable character.

These acts he is not only encouraged, but commanded to commit on all occasions which may seem fit to his own good pleasure. It confers, chief, therefore, upon this mere sorter of letters and deliverer of mails more authority than that claimed by the supreme court of his own state, the president of the United States and his entire cabinet—always excepting, of course, his superior, the postmaster general. It puts him wholly outside the law, makes him totally irresponsible, even to his own conscience and common sense, and, to cap the climax of absurdities, places the liberty of the press, without which our present form of government might as well be abandoned, completely at his mercy.

These propositions are startling, but true, and, being true, they are worth the careful attention of every citizen who observes the signs of the times. Fortunately, it is not conceivable that the supreme court will or can give effect to them. However desirable may be the end in view, it surely cannot be worth attaining at the expense of liberty and justice. Yet this is, in exact terms, the issue involved.

It requires no special knowledge or legal training to detect the vice of such legislation. Like all arbitrary and despotic enactments, it puts might above right, and justifies the unlawful means it is compelled to employ by the conceived desirability of the end it seeks to attain.

Take section 3894 of the statute: "Any person violating the provisions of this section" (which makes the mere mailing of a letter, or, in fact, any mail matter having the remotest connection with the business of the lottery company a misdemeanor) "may be proceeded against by information or indictment."

This section has at least one merit—it recognizes the forms of laws, if, at the same time, it does trample upon the constitution. It presupposes a regular proceeding of some kind, a trial by jury with all the regular incidents of such a trial. However, it is wholly unconstitutional, and, upon analysis, absurd. The state of Louisana, and indeed any individual or company, is debarred by law from maintaining a mail service of her own, yet the general government, not only a common carrier, but an exclusive common carrier, declines to accept the mail matter of one state because in other states it is declared contraband. Instead of being neutral in the matter, and permitting the states to settle their own differences, the government seeks to imprison or terrorize those who attempt to make it do its plain duty, which is to do for all the states (and not for any chosen number of them) what severally they cannot do so well for themselves, provide a safe, speedy and trustworthy service unimpaired by such star chamber restrictions as those now being enforced.

But if the denial of mail facilities to the press and the public because of differences of opinion with regard to new distinctions in morality arising between the several states be a deprivation of the rights of the states as declared by the law and the constitution, what shall we say of section 3929, which authorizes the postmaster general "upon evidence satisfactory to himself!" we quote and italicise the clause to instruct his postmasters to stamp with the word "Fraudulent" letters which he thinks fall within the provisions of this very act.

Whatever has been said of the Louisiana State Lottery company, its worst enemies have never claimed it to be "fraudulent." The good faith of the company has never been called in question. Even those newspapers which have taken exception to its existence have never denied the honesty of its methods nor of the gentlemen—such men as Generals Beauregard and Early are among them—who have superintended the drawings.

The framers of the statute knew this—it was a fact of common notoriety—but this is just why they got up the rubber stamp scheme. Repeat the word "Fraudulent" enough, they reasoned, and perhaps after a while the idea will sink in—the public will in time, perhaps, come to believe the very opposite of what they had always believed before.

The device seems flimsy enough, but in its general operation it is highly dangerous and oppressive.

For this enormous power is exercised by the postmaster "upon evidence satisfactory to himself." Yet this evidence cannot be obtained, so the statute is careful to say, by opening the letter. Oh, no; that would be a breach of confidence; and, besides, it is expressly prohibited by law. Then how is the postmaster to "obtain evidence which is satisfactory to himself?" He is to GUESS, just guess? A private citizen who libels another cannot set up in justification of his slander evidence of the truth of his statement which is merely "satisfactory to himself." If this were so, it would vastly simplify many a libel case. This evidence must be satisfactory also to a jury of 12 men, but it is different with the postmaster. He can brand the correspondence of the most upright business man in the land on the mere suspicion and be held not in the least accountable. The proprietor of a newspaper who fails, perhaps through the death of witnesses or through some other accident, to establish the truth of charges made in the interest of the public, from good motives and for justifiable ends, is none the less mulcted in damages, but your postmaster, no indeed. He can libel anybody from any motive or for any end, and when he is called to account he is sure to have "evidence satisfactory to himself."

Again, the provisions of the statute are not restricted to the mailing of lottery tickets, remittances or letters of inquiry; they cover a much wider category of any "scheme," in fact, or "device, for obtaining money of any kind through the mails, by means of false or fraudulent pretenses or promises" is equally prohibited, and all the subterfuges and devices of the statutes are equally applicable in this as in the case of the lottery.

Now, at first blush, there seems to be a well meaning provision. Lottery companies are not necessarily fraudulent, whereas all such "schemes," such as described in the section, undoubtedly are—but who is to be the judge of whether or not they are fraudulent? The court and jury? Not a bit of it. The postmaster, again. He can put his little stamp on the printed envelope of an insurance company or bank if he is not satisfied with the "pretenses or promises" upon which they are doing business. But he will not? Why not? He has the power. What guaranty have we that he will not abuse it?

Postmasters are not always obliging or just. Newspapers have found that out to their cost long ago. But to what proportions will the petty exactions of consequential officials and their employes rise when these added powers are in full operation?

Suppose the case—every newspaper man knows how possible such a case is—of the business manager of a newspaper who, in entire good faith, accepts the advertisement or prospectus of some land improvement company, which turns out, as a matter of fact, to be mythical. He is liable to arrest. But of course he may succeed in proving his good faith and the absence of any intent to commit the crime. This we will concede. Though why he should be put to this inconvenience by the postoffice department we cannot imagine. But how about the edition of his paper in which the unfortunate advertisement appears? It will not be delivered. It may contain news of the greatest importance to its subscribers, the sentiments of the greatest thinkers and moralists of the day, but because of this one advertisement—the true character of which the publishers of the paper could not possibly be expected to know any more than the public it was designed to decieve—it is excluded from the mails.

However, if one class of advertisement is to be excluded, why not any other? Could not, indeed, will not the law be extended to take in medical advertisements, those of wine and liquor houses, in fact all advertisements of any character except those of church or lodge meetings? It is easy to see that the tendency of such legislation is to seriously abridge the liberty of the press, besides depriving it of its legitimate revenues without due process of law.

The mail service, we repeat, is the exclusive franchise of the general government, and yet it is to be administered under these restrictions and conditions. What, then, becomes of the liberty of the press? Evidently the men who framed this bill thought little, or cared less about the liberty of a press in the habit of criticising their acts. But the public has an interest in the press, and newspaper men have a right to carry on their business without interference except by the due process of law. The constitution expressly declares not only that this liberty shall not be destroyed, but also that it shall not be abridged.

And why is the liberty of the press abridged? Simply to suppress a lottery company incorporated under the laws of the State of Louisiana. These laws have never been declared unconstitutional. The right of the State of Louisiana to authorize or maintain a lottery company has never been questioned. The supreme court of the state has in fact declared that the question of the extension of the company's charter is properly before the people, and no one doubts but that this extension will be ratified by as large a vote as cast at the last election for that purpose. The State of Louisiana, its charities and its works of improvement receive large sums yearly from the revenue of the lottery, and it is absurd to say in this land of raffles and church fairs that the State of Lonisiana has no moral right to maintain a lottery. Any number of governments and states have approved of lotteries whether conducted for private gain or for the public benefit. It is rather late in the day to import such new distinctions into the practical business of carrying on a government.

Besides, who can tell where this proselytism through the postoffice will stop? Shall Maine impose her prohibition laws upon wine growing California? Shall the Sunday laws of Connecticut be saddled upon those states, whose history, the very character of their populations, lead them to regard Sunday a day to be differently observed? All these questions are matters of opinion, often of theological opinion, questions which are at least open to debate, and yet it might be sought, through the postoffice department, to make them the rule for all.

Nothing could be more monstrous, nor, in the light of history, so absurd. In 1836, a law similar to the present one was introduced in congress, forbidding the delivery of seditious documents relative to slavery. Senator, afterwards President Buchanan, supported the law; Daniel Webster opposed it. But what were these seditious documents? They were the criticisms of the Abolitionists upon slavery as it then existed in the Southern states.

The bill proposed to muzzle these expressions of public opinion was undoubtedly a blow at the liberty of the press. It failed of enactment. Does anyone doubt, if the same measure had come up later, say in 1862, that what would have been considered "seditious documents" would be reflections upon the right of the North to deprive the South of their property in slaves, without their consent and without compensation? Few now question that the abolition of slavery has been a blessing to this country, and was dictated by the best sentiment of humanity. But how was this sentiment aroused but through the press? And how was it proposed to nullify this sentiment but by just such means as we are now invoked to enforce the opinions of a dominant party, which, even if they do not vary with regard to this matter, are certain to do so with regard to a great many questions which fall within the same rule?

It is impossible, however, that the supreme court of the United States can uphold such a statute, however much it may care to do so. Such a decision would not only be contrary to all its precedents, and contrary to the organic law of the land, but, were it lived up to, would make life in the republic well nigh intolerable. Indeed, legislation, such as betrays itself in this statute, saps the very foundation of liberty in substituting for the despotism of the absolute monarch, the oppression and tyranny of partisan power entrenched behind the irresponsible authority of its officers.

During the Mexican war, communication between the troops under General Scott and the government at Washington was very imperfect. Months on months elapsed before dispatches and reports could be transmitted to and from the seat of war.

It so happened that, although the then dominant party who opposed Gen. Scott succeeded in securing his removal from the command of the army, the order to that effect did not reach him until after the City of Mexico had capitulated.

It is needless to state that the hero of this brilliant campaign was immediately reinstated, and as little as possible said about the injustice done him. Gen. Scott made, however, this one remark:

"The long arm of power," he said, "has taken me away from the head of my troops."

The epithet as applied to the general government is certainly expressive. "The long arm of power" is not always accompanied with vision, foresight or self-control. It sometimes ignores local needs and differences, and, in its impatience to act, overrides liberty and justice.

A SOCIAL BLUNDER.

Something a Society Woman Would Rather Have Left Unsaid.

It was at an afternoon tea. At the piano sat a woman who was notoriously good at Chopin but reveled also in Greig and Tschaikowsky and other of the weirdly fascinating Northern composers. Everybody listened, a thing which seldom happens.

In an alcove stood two women. One belonged to an old New York family. She was quietly adored by the nouveau riche. But she was a woman of such unassuming character that assertion was impossible to her. Bred in the aristocratic set, and habituated to her invironment, she took things for granted that other women were disagreeably conscious of. The woman beside her was by some cheerful affinity her close friend, but she had a humbler station in the world. She was a teacher, the head of a department in a grammar school. A woman of grace and refinement, distinguished in carriage, she was as much at home as any woman in the room.

The woman at the piano finished playing something by Heller amid the fluffy patter of gloved hands.

"Charming!" exclaimed the teacher.

"How delightful she is!" added the other woman in the alcove.

"Does she teach?" asked the first speaker.

"Oh, no," came the reply, "she's a lady."

The teacher's face scarcely changed, but her friend, from whom the remark slipped in the most involuntary way, had scarcely pronounced the last word when she flushed to her temples. She clutched her companion's arm in the most painful embarrassment. "Forgive me!" she stammered. "I do not misunderstand you," smiled the teacher, with a gentleness that crowned her with the highest title.

But it had been said!—New York Recorder.

HER WAGES LONG AGO.

A Man Who Says Women Used to Earn as Much as Men.

One of the things about which women raise their voices most emphatically at the present time is the ratio of their wages to a man's wages for equal services. But now comes one who says that in the Fifteenth Century no such distinction was made. The late Prof. Thorold Rogers in his "Six Centuries of Work and Wages," speaking of this century, writes: The agricultural laborer gets about 4d. a day for his work. The man who is employed as a help to the thatcher or tiler to the mason or bricklayer is paid at the rate of the agricultural laborers. This help was sometimes a woman, and thus it is seen that women's work of an unskilled kind was equally well paid to that of men." This statement is the more interesting because in modern times it is just in unskilled work that women come off worst. That the Fifteenth Century 4d. a day was something more than the starvation pittance which many women now earn is made clear by the rest of the passage: "The full price of a laborer's board was 1s. a week. His wages was twice or three times the cost of his maintenance under contract."

A TRUE STORY.

Her Ingenious Tactics on Receiving the First Kiss From Her Lover.

This, I am assured, is a true story, says a writer in the Detroit Free Press. The gentleman himself told it to me, and the lady, now his wife, sat beside him and admitted it to be true. He had waited on her for several weeks, when one evening he resolved to kiss her, and told her so.

"You shall do nothing of the kind," she said with a good deal of asperity

But he was not to be frightened out of it. He reached for her, but she drew away and indignantly declared that if he undertook any such liberties she would scream. He didn't believe she would, so he grabbed her up and gave her a good, rousing smack.

Sure enough she screeched like a steam calliope, and frightened the young man well-nigh out of his senses, for he heard the family rushing toward the parlor. The young lady's mother was the first to enter and the father came close behind.

"What's the matter?" asked the mother.

The young man stood by the piano, wishing the roof would fall in and bury everybody. The young lady had jumped upon the sofa.

"I saw a mouse," she said.

The parents went back, and the young man kissed her until she could not have told a mouse from a mountain.

Studying Hydrostatics.

It did not require a person of any great discernment to see at a glance that the dusty roads of the country were more familiar to his gaze and more intimately acquainted with the soles of his cowhide boots than were the pavements of Broadway or Fifth avenue. He landed at the city hall "L" station and started out for a stroll on Park row, and the "fakirs" along the row instantly marked him for their own. He invested liberally in their wares and accepted all the sacrifices they made in his behalf, but at last he protested against any further sacrifices. "Neow, don't I tell yeou I've got a watch tew hum and wouldn't hev thet at enny figger?" he yelled at one of them who did his thieving in a legitimate way by selling timepieces with water escapements and perambulatory movements.

The innocent pursued his way down Park row. It had been raining hard and the gutters were swollen with rushing torrents of water. The stranger watched them disappear through the sewer grating at Ann street, with wonder and astonishment depicted on his countenance. He got down on his knees, and, laying his purchases on the ground, peered down through the opening. Then, turning to an interested and amused crowd of spectators, he said: "Gosh, suthin' must hev broke loose here. I never see sech a small hole hold such a powerful sight o' water."

Remembers Men by Their Neckties.

There is a ticket taker in one of the large theatres in this city who occasionally exercises his memory in a rather curious way. Generally he gives each man who goes out between the acts a return check, but occasionally he omits this and relies solely on his memory to recognize those who wish to re-enter the theatre. A friend who saw him doing this the other night remarked that he must have a wonderful memory for faces to be able to preform the feat without making a mistake. "No," answered the ticket taker, "I have a very poor memory for faces. I do not rely on their faces at all. Indeed I seldom look at the men's faces. What I go by is their neckties. If you will watch the neckties you will observe that no two are exactly alike. They differ much more than the faces do and they are easier to remember. I might forget a man's face, but his necktie, never. I have followed this rule for years and I have never made a mistake yet."—New York Sun.

Money Spent for Show.

Ten thousand carriages in Central park have a coachman and footman. At least 5,000 more have a coachman. Twenty-five thousand people ride there simply to wait on the rich, to minister to the luxury of the opulent. Ten thousand of these people are lackeys. The gorgeous and impressive uniforms—tall hats, rosettes, top boots, buttons—of the coachmen and lackeys are furnished by the owners of the carriages. They buy uniforms for the coachmen and lackeys just as they buy harness for the horses, and the cost is about the same. The uniforms cost about $150 per carriage. For the 5,000 more modest turnouts, with a plain, old fashioned coachman, the uniform costs about $30.

It costs $1,500,000 to make the coachmen and the lackeys look like monkeys. It costs $150,000 more to dress up the old fashioned coachman. The aggregate is $1,650,000.—New York Journal.

A Goliath in Stone.

Vinalhaven, Me., claims to have produced the largest stone ever brought to light. The Bodwell Granite company recently quarried a shaft of granite which is the largest piece of stone ever quarried anywhere, and if erected will be the highest, largest and heaviest single piece of solid stone standing, or that ever stood, so far as any record can be found. In height it considerable exceeds any of the Egyptain obelisks. The tallest of these, which was brought from Heliopolis to Alexandria by Emperor Constantine, and afterward taken to Rome, where it is still standing, is 105 feet 7 inches high, while the Vinalhaven shaft is 115 feet long, 10 feet square at the base and weighs 850 tons. It is understood that the company quarried this immense monolith of their own account, not having an order for anything of the kind.—New York Ledger.

A True and Great Story.

Joachim of violin renown has been playing at a concert in Manchester. After it was all over he was walking up and down the railway platform enjoying a good cigar and the consciousness that he had never played better in his life. The cheers of his audience still rang in his ears and he was full of pleasurable self-satisfaction. A respectable navvy, dressed in his Sunday best, kept passing and repassing gazing intently at the great master. Presently he came up to Joachim and asked him for a light. This the musician gave him. Having lit his pipe, he looked Joachim full in the face, and then, tapping him with emphasis on the shoulder, he said: "But Paginini was the man!"

Making Glad the Waste (Waist) Places.

"That's what I call making glad the waist places," said Smithson, as he put his arm around a lady's waist. But Lilly won't care much for this show of affection if Smithson doesn't get rid of that disagreeable catarrh of his. Won't somebody tell him that Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy will cure him.

By its mild, soothing, antiseptic, cleansing and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases of Chronic Catarrh in the Head, as thousands can testify. "Cold in the Head" is cured with a few applications. Catarrhal Headache is relieved and cured as if by magic.

In perfect faith, the makers of Dr Sage's Catarrh Remedy—the World's Dispensary Medical Association, of Buffalo, N. Y., offer to pay $500 to any one suffering from Chronic Catarrh in the Head whom they cannot cure.

Now, if the conditions were reversed —if they asked you to pay $500 for a positive cure you might hesitate. Here are reputable men, with years of honorable dealing; thousands of dollars and a great name back of them.

They believe in themselves. Isn't it worth a trial? Isn't any trial preferable to catarrh?

Is sometimes more satisfactory than any number of "Wise Laws." There are thousands and thousands of modern instances in which Swift's Specific, S.S.S. has justified all the claims made for it as the greatest of vegetable remedies for diseases that have in their origin impure blood and a debilitated condition of the system. Mr. John H. Lyles, of Sorento, Ill., writes: "I suffered for five years with mercurial rheumatism, which was the result of potash and mercurial treatment by physicians for constitutional blood poison. They not only failed to cure me, but made me a physical wreck and my life a burden. I then commenced taking Swift's Specific, S.S.S. and after using a few bottles was entirely cured of the rheumatism which the doctors brought on by their remedies, and of the blood poison which they had failed to cure."

DESCRIPTION OF HARNESS.

A fine Buggy Harness stitched twelve stitches to the inch, except traces which are stitched ten. Is made to represent a $50 harness. It has a 3 or 3 1-2 hand laced, leather pad saddle, with covered seat and jockeys; is made from fine stock. Bridle is of usual dimensions, has fine blinds, nice leather front and beautiful rosettes with glass centers, nice nickel bit. Check-rein, either overdraw with nose piece, or side check. Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strap, breeching and shirt folds are made either of patent enamel or plain harness leather as preferred and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased. Give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Boxloops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7;45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

YOU WANT

a San Francisco paper and of course you want a good one. The WEEKLY EXAMINER fills the want completely, for it is the best. It gives you every week not only all the news, but the best literary and miscellaneous matter published on the American continent—that is its specialty; being the best. It wants your subscription—yours particularly—and offers not only to you, but to every other subscriber, one or more attractive premiums.

In the first place, it gives every subscriber, one of the four magnificent etchings or paintings described below, and delivers it safely at his address, postage paid.

"The Retreat from Moscow," by Meissonier,
"The Roman Chariot Race," by A. Wagner.

Each of these pictures is 21x28 inches, and they are elegantly reproduced in fac simile, showing every tint and color of the great originals, either one of which could not be purchased for $100,000.

"Women and Children First," by C. Napier Hemy,
"Christ Leaving the Prætorium," by Gustave Doré.

Each of these pictures is reproduced in photogravure, size 21x28, and eminently fitted for framing, and will adorn the walls of the most refined house.

Each subscriber has the choice of any one of these four pictures, which will be mailed him in a tube direct from the EXAMINER office, as soon as the subscription is received.

In the second place, it will give 5,000 premiums, valued in the aggregate at about $125,000 to its subscribers this year. If there are 50,000 subscribers, one in ten will get one of these premiums; if there are 100,000, only one in twenty. But no matter how many there are, each and every one of these premiums—which range in value from 50 cents to $6,000—will be given absolutely without cost to some of those who have paid $1.50 for the WEEKLY EXAMINER for one year. The EXAMINER is thoroughly responsible, as you know, or as Wells, Fargo & Co. or any bank or commercial agency in San Francisco will assure you, and the leading men of the city will see that its premiums are distributed exactly as agreed and that every subscriber no matter where he is located, will receive just what is assigned to him.

Of course you want your home paper also, and you can just as well as not save a little money by taking the EXAMINER with it. The price of the WEEKLY EXAMINER is $1.50 per year, including the premium picture and your share of the $125,000 list of premiums, which are fully described in the twelve page Premium Supplement, which will be sent free on application to

A Special Election

On the Bond Question, Tuesday, August 25th, 1891—The Agreement and Proposition—Don't Fail to Vote Against This Nafarious Scheme.

Notice is hereby given that whereas the Duluth and Dakota railway company have filed in the office of the county auditor of Polk county, Minnesota, a proposition in writing, as follows, viz:

PROPOSITION.

To all whom it may concern:

Take notice that the Duluth and Dakota railway company, a corporation duly formed, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Minnesota, hereby makes application to the county of Polk, in said state, for aid in the construction of that portion of its line of railroad extending from a point within the city of Crookston, in said county of Polk, to its point of intersection with the line of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad in the county of Itasca, in said state; and to that end the said Duluth and Dakota railway company make the following proposition:

1. Said county of Polk shall make and issue negotiable coupon bonds thereof to the amount of two hundred and twenty thousand dollars, in the denomination of one thousand dollars each, all to bear date the first day of January, A. D. 1892, and be payable to the Duluth & Dakota railway company or bearer twenty years after date thereof, and not before maturity thereof at the option of said county, and to bear interest from date thereof, payable semi-annually, on the first days of January and July in each year, and at the rate of five per cent per year.

2. Said Duluth and Dakota railway company, in consideration of said aid and bonds, shall and will, at the election of said county of Polk, issue thereto such number of the shares of its capital stock as will, at the par value of such stock, correspond with the principal sum of such bonds.

3. All said bonds shall be deposited in escrow prior to any delivery thereof to said Duluth and Dakota railway company; and such deposit shall be made with the First National Bank of Crookston, a corporation duly formed, organized and existing under and by virtue of the National Banking act of the United States of America and having its principal place of business, office and residence at the city of Crookston, county of Polk and state of Minnesota; and all the stock certificates for said shares of stock shall likewise be deposited and placed with the same depository and at the same time with said bonds and stock certificates shall be and remain in the possession and custody of the said First National bank of Crookston until all said portion of the line of railroad of the said Duluth and Dakota railway company, extending from a point within the said city of Crookston to the point of intersection or junction thereof with the said Duluth and Winnipeg railroad in the said county of Itasca, shall have been located, constructed and completed according to the ordinary standard gauge and in actual operation, with cars running thereon.

4. The said Duluth & Dakota railway company in consideration of said aid and bonds, shall and will, prior to the first day of December, A. D. 1892, well and truly locate, construct and complete according to the ordinary standard gauge and put in actual operation with cars running thereon all that portion of its said line of railroad extending from a point within said city of Crookston to the point of intersection or junction thereof with the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad in said county of Itasca.

5. Within thirty days from and after (and under no circumstances until after) completion and actual operation as aforesaid by the said Duluth and Dakota railway company of all said portion of its said line of railroad, the said First National bank of Crookston shall deliver all said stock certificates to said county of Polk and all said bonds to the said Duluth and Dakota railway company upon production of the certificate in writing of the Railway Commissioners of the State of Minnesota, or one of them, to the effect that, upon examination and inspection actually made and had, the said portion of said line of railroad has been duly and properly constructed, completed and put in operation as aforesaid.

6. It is mutually understood that the construction, maintainance and operation of said portion of the line of railroad of the said Duluth and Dakota railway company will furnish to the farmers, merchants and other inhabitants of said county of Polk a competing line of railway transportation from the several stations thereof in said county to the head of Lake Superior; and that such competing line will beshorter than any now existing line or lines of transportation between any point within said county and the head of Lake Superior by en estimated distance of not less than fifty miles; and in order to permanently secure and insure to all the inhabitants of said county the advantages now contemplated and which ought to accrue to them from the construction, maintainance and operation of said competing line, the said Duluth and Dakota railway company, in consideration of said aid and bonds, hereby guarantees, on behalf of its successors and assigns, to said county and to each and all the inhabitants thereof, that the rate for transportation of any grain, merchandise or other commodity to any station on the line of the said Duluth & Dakota railway within said county of Polk from the head of Lake Superior or from any such station to the head of Lake Superior shall never exceed the rate per bushel or per ton per mile now being charged by any or either of the now existing line or lines of railway extending between any station in said county and the head of said Lake Superior.

In testimony whereof the said Duluth and Dakota railway company has caused this instrument to be signed by its president and secretary and to be duly sealed with its corporate seal.

Dated July 14. A. D. 1891.

DULUTH & DAKOTA RAILWAY COMPANY.
{ CORPORATE SEAL. } By R. W. Cameron, Pres.
By Charles Kydd, Sec.

Now therefore notice is hereby given, that a special election will be held and had in and for the purpose of voting upon the said proposition on and that the polls will be open in the various towns, wards and precincts, from nine o'clock in the forenoon until five o'clock in the afternoon of said day.

Twenty-fifth Day of August, A. D. 1891,

Given under my hand and seal this 5th day of August, 1891.

(OFFICIAL SEAL.) C. U. WEBSTER,
County Auditor Polk County, Minn.

AGREEMENT.

In addition to the above proposition the following contract has been entered into between the Duluth and Dakota Railway Company and the County of Polk:

THIS AGREEMENT, Made and entered into this 21 day of July, A.D. 1891, by and between the Board of county Commissioners of Polk County in the state of Minnesota, party of the first part, and the Duluth and Dakota Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the law of the State of Minnesota, party of the second part; WITNESSETH:—

WHEREAS, in order to secure said bonds, said party of the second part is desirous of entering into an agreement with the said party of the first part, in behalf of the people of said Polk County whereby the rate on wheat shipped from any point in the County of Polk, on the line of railway of said party or the second part to the head of Lake Superior, shall not exceed the rate of twelve and one half (12½) cents per hundred (100) pounds from said point of shipment to said destination.

NOW, THEREFORE, said party of the second part hereby agrees that it will at times and seasons carry or procure to be carried, all wheat delivered to it at stations along the line of its railway in said Polk county, at a rate not to exceed twelve and one half (12½) cents per hundred (100) pound for the carrying of said wheat to the head of Lake Superior; provided, however, that said PolkCounty shall vote favorably upon the proposition of said party of the second part for bonds to aid in the building of its said railway and that said bonds to the amount, not to exceed two hundred and twenty thousand ($220,000) dollars, shall be voted and delivered to said railway company when its line of railway shall be completed from a connection with the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad in Itasca County Minnesota, to a point in the city of Crookston, in said Polk County and State of Minnesota.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties hereto have caused these presents to be signed and sealed as respective officers and seals, the day and year first above written.

State Teacher's Institute.

An institution for the County of Polk will be held at Crookston Minnesota, during the week commencing Monday, August 24th, 1891.

The state will provide efficient instructors, who will be furnished with such professional books, apparatus and material as have been thoroughly tested and found to be of special service to teachers. Great pains will be taken to make the instruction pointed and in the degree practical, in matters pretaining to the management and grading of schools and the teaching of common school branches.

One evening will be devoted to a lecture by some good speaker.

The conductor and superintendent may also arrange for another entertainment.

Teachers are requested to note that this fall and next spring some of the examination questions in "Theory and practice" sent out by this department will be based on Page's Theory and Practice; and the instructors will make free use of the same work. Every teacher should precure a copy for use in the institute and for subsequent study.

Teachers who take proper interest in their calling, and who desire by self-improvement to advance to higher positions, will be present at the opening Monday afternoon and remain till Friday evening. At the close of the week, certificates signed by the State Superintendent, county superintendent and conductor, will be issued to all who have been neither tardy nor absent at any session, and who have been diligent and shown progress in the work of the institute.

All schools can be legally closed during institute week at the request of the teachers or the county superintendent.

The institute will be in charge of the superintendent, who will make all required arrangements for its success, as well as for the accommodation of teachears, who are requested to give him early notice of their intention to be present, that he may provide board for all at the lowest rates.

A Serious Matter.

The late "Sunset Cox, who so long represented one of the New York City districts in Congress, was an inveterate jester. A matter-of-fact friend once wrote Cox a long letter, the burden of which was that he should quit joking. "Hitch your wagon to a star, and be serious," wrote the would-be mentor. Cox replied: "I might hitch my wagon to the dog star, and that would be Sirus, wouldent it?" That must have been an August jest, for these are the days when the dog-star rages, and it was a good enough jokefor warm weather. But it is really a serious matter, if you are obliged to travel in hot weather, to select a line on which you can journey in comfort. Such a one is "The Burlington," which follows the east bank of the Mississippi for three hundred miles, under the shadow of lofty tree-crowned bluffs on one side and the sparkling waters of the river, fanned by cooling breezes, on the other. For tickets and rates by this line, call on any ticket agent, or addres W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Passr Agent C., B. & N. R.R. St. Paul Minn.

La Grippe Again.

The most direct way to China and Japan now seems to be via Vancouver, instead of San Francisco. At least, the news comes that way, and the traffic is likely to follow.

The sliding railroad of the World's Fair will be a mile long, and the trains will go a mile a minute. One may go from Texas to Japan, so to speak, in thirty seconds. This will be better than perspiring along a walk and trying to pass the six people from Podunk who will walk abreast.

Although the population of Salvador is only 664,500, it is an average of seventy to the square mile. Her income also exceeds her expenses, which is an unusual thing for a Spanish-American nation. The Salvadorians have a little war with their neighbors now and then, but still manage to keep nearly out of debt.

There isn't very much difference between being toasted and being roasted, but the announcement that fraternizing French and Russian officers at Cronstadt toasted the Czar and President Carnot is undoubtedly more pleasing to those individuals than news that they had been "roasted" by their naval officers would be.

Paris is laughing over a joke about an American inventor who is said to have patented an electric corset that is to bring about the reign of mortality at once. If one of these articles is pressed by a lover's arm, it at once emits a shriek like the whistle of a railway engine; and the inventor claims that he has already married three of his daughters, owing to the publicity thus thrust upon a backward lover.

Col. Olcott, the theosoph, is a man of discriminating character. When some poor mortal who has become a captive to the esoteric science bestows money on the cause the colonel investigates to see if the devisor could afford it, and in case he is not satisfied such is the case, he returns a portion or all of it. Therein he is different from any other fakir the world has ever produced.

Italy is in a hard way. Advices from Rome state that there will be a Government deficit for the year of nearly $16,000,000, and that, too, notwithstanding all the rigid economies practiced. The salaries of the diplomatic corps are all to be reduced, and the pruning knife is to be applied to every department of the Government. So cripled are the national finances that Italy will have no official exhibit at the World's Fair. The Vatican is reported to be even more financially embarrassed than the Government, and retrenchment in every possible way will be resorted to.

French naval officers visiting Russia are concerned because their friends do not speak of the Republic but of France, and it is explained to them that the Czar cannot drink to the welfare of Democratic institutions, As with Macbeth, "amen" sticks in his throat when free institutions are praised. And this, though seemingly a small matter. makes the alliance of France and Russia unnatural, and one that may be very easily broken.

The death of Sallie McLendon, colored, of Fordyce, Ark., at the claimed age of one hundred and thirty years, calls to mind that some years back one of her sons, then over seventy years old, was so sick as to need the service of a doctor. "I'm afraid your son is in a bad way, auntie,'' said the doctor, "and that he's hardly strong enough to pull through." "For de Lawd, doctor, Is'pose you're right. He was always de sickliest of de chilluns, an' I neber thought we'd raise de poo' chile."

In the National Cemetery at Pittsburg Landing there are 3,590 union soldiers and four women buried in the cemetery. The latter were nurses in the army, who contracted diseases while at work in the hospitals, died and were buried in the cemetery. Every other grave is marked with a headstone, but the graves of the women were entirely ignored. Some one had planted an evergreen or so over their graves, but otherwise they are unmarked. No one seems to know why the graves have been neglected, save that the War Department directed that no tombstones should be erected. There must be an interesting bit of history connected with the matter, if one had time and opportunity to look it up, and some women's society might start an investigation.

He struck Volker on the side of the head with a piece of broomstick, producing a wound which may prove serious if not fatal. Proctor claims that the blow was given in self-defense.

NORTH DAKOTA.

At Dickinson the hardest rain ever known fell the other day inundating all the low lands and laying the grain flat. The damage is great.

Imposing ceremonies attended the laying of the corner stone of the new Lutheran college at Grand Forks. There were addresses from Reverends Roalkvim and Gesberding and a college banquet in the evening.

The remains of Mrs. Mary F. Duffy, wife of Editor Frank J. Duffy, who died from heart failure at Grand Forks, were taken to Watertown, Wis., where funeral services were held. She had been married three years and leaves two children, one an infant six weeks old.

The contract for building the new Great Northern passenger depot for Grand Forks has been let to Moore & Hackett, of Minneapolis. Work will be commenced at once and completed Dec. 1. It will be 137x60, two stories of Kettle river stone, fronting on Demers avenue.

A star chamber examination was carried on at Dickinson for the purpose of securing evidence on which to arrest saloon men. There has been nothing sufficient for a criminal charge so far. Witnesses will continue to be examined before the state's attorney.

Rickert Larson, the 10 year-old son of Tobias Larson, met death in a strange manner at Sims. The lad was leading a horse with picket rope, which he foolishly circled around his body. The horse shied at some object, upsetting the boy, and ran away, dragging him nearly a mile before captured. The boy's neck was broken and the body frightfully mangled.

Bids for building the school for deaf of North Dakota were opened the other day at Devils Lake, N. J. Sampson, Libby & Libby, Kilroe Bros., E. Siskron and Emil Bruce, all of Minneapolis, bid respectively $13,075, $12,100, $13,005, $11,800 and $15,600. Crandall Bros., of Ft. Totten, $11,489; Morland & Alsip, Grand Forks, $12,050, and H. C. Paul, of Devils Lake, $10,780. The contract has not yet been awarded, but Paul will undoubtedly get it.

For the past few days raids have been made on the blind pigs in Traill county. The sheriff dropped into Mayville a few days ago and in a short time had everything quiet. Mr. Decker, who has been one of the most persistent in inventing schemes by which he might carry on the illegal traffic, is now languishing in jail, being unable to furnish bonds for his appearance at court, as is William Krienke of Blanchard. William Kreeger left for parts unknown as soon as the sheriff appeared with a search warrant,

At Devils lake the Moline, Milburn & Stoddard company have commenced replevin against A. O. Whipple, assignee of Ed I. P. Staede, to recover possession of notes and machinery claimed as property of the plaintiff, but included as Staede's in the assignment. Marshal Price, of the United States court: Agent Judson and Attorney L. A. Reed are here in plaintiff's interest. The inventory of notes weighs several pounds. Marshal Price has not succeeded in getting the notes, the face value of which is over $60,000.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

All places in Huron where liquor was illegally sold were raided and the stocks on hand were gathered in.

The state railroad commission visited Pierpont by request of the farmers who desire a site on which to build an elevator. They afterwards went to Ferney on the same errand.

Chas. M. Brown, of Rapid City, was unanimously nominated by the Republicans for circuit judge of the Seventh district at a meeting of the bar held at Rapid City, and W. H. Frye, of Hot Springs, is the Democratic nominee.

A terrific hail storm laid waste a large share of the uncut grain in Miner county. The storm was confined principally to the extreme eastern part of the county, and as harvesting was largely finished it was not as damaging as it might have been.

Sam Smith was arrested by Sheriff Hoven, of Bangor, for raping a young Norwegian girl whom he was bringing to Bowdle to do housework. He had his examination at Bangor and was held in bail for $400, and, not securing the bail, he was ordered to be confined in the Ipswich jail for trial.

Some farmers report the appearance of unusually large numbers of grasshoppers, which resemble the hoppers of years ago, so destructive to vegetation in Iowa and Nebraska. While no damage will result from these grasshoppers this year, it is feared by many that next season may see them in such numbers as to destroy the crops.

It has been discovered that diptheria is prevalent in the South Dakota hospital for the insane, located near Yankton. There are 300 people in the institute, and great alarm is felt. Six well developed cases are being treated. It is feared that the scourge cannot be confined to these. The hospital has no sewerage connection save with a huge cess pool on the premises, and the accumulated refuse of two years is deposited there sweltering in the August sun. The hospital is under rigid quarantine, and attaches of it are forbidden to visit the city.

The interior department in the person of Special Agent Cooper is attempting to appraise the damage done by the hostiles to friendly Indians at Pine Ridge agency last winter during the disturbance. It was supposed that the total damages of this character would not exceed $25,000, but claims have so far been put in to the amount of $300,000, and the work is not yet completed. As to the manner in which the Indians are putting in their claims the matter of trunks may be taken as a criterion. Some Indians claim to have lost as many as sixteen trunks, with their contents, worth from $100 to $600 each. Special Agent Cooper, however, was on the ground last winter, and is in a position to know personally with reasonable accuracy the exact damage done. A wholesale paring of accounts will be certain to take place before the claims are finally allowed.

WISCONSIN.

The condition of J. L. Lenderman, of Osseo, who was hurt in a runaway accident recently, is not as serious as at first reported.

Dr. W. M. Beck, rearrested on a criminal charge, was discharged after full examination on the part of the state by Justice Averille.

Charles Anderson and Mrs. Cora V. Graves, residents of Eau Claire, eloped the other night. Mrs. Graves has a husband and two children. The runaway couple were arrested in Augusta and placed in jail here.

The longshoreman's union at Ashland has given notice of an increase in the price of loading lumber vessels to 50 cents an hour after August 10. The raise applies to the whole Chequamegon district.

A young man, Wilmot Tisdale, has strangely disappeared from Ashland. His sister arrived from Canada, whom he wrote that he would meet. Nobody has seen him for several days, and it is feared that there has been foul play.

The transfer of the lease of the Hotel Cumberland was effected at Cumberland, whereby J. W. Stone, register of deeds of Barron county and one of the most popular men in this region, takes charge of this resort as landlord. The hotel will at once be greatly improved.

Charles D. Skillings, a local newspaper man, is heir to an estate in Portland, Me., worth $5,000,000. Miss Skillings, of the Boston Herald staff, is another heir. The property is land leased in 1792 by John Skillings to Hiram Illsly for a term of 96 years, the term expiring last April.

It is reported that negotiations are going on which may result in the sale of the Mississippi River Logging company, two saw mills and real estate here and pine on the Eau Claire river to the Northwestern Lumber of this city. The deal would cover property for which the Mississippi Logging company paid the Eau Claire Lumber company about $1,000,000 three or four years ago.

W. J. Spry, a well known mining man, on the range, has disappeared. He was last seen in Herley, July 24, having just returned from a visit to Ohio. He seemed to be in a dazed condition, and started for his home at the Superior mining location. He never reached there, and his family supposed he was still in Ohio until they learned by accident that he had been seen in Hurley. It is now believed that he was lost in the woods, and an organized search will be made for him, although it is scarcely hoped to find him alive.

IOWA.

Gus Rasmussen, aged 30, was killed by lighting near Spencer, on the Ryerson cattle ranch.

W. N. Johnson, a prominent horseman of Cedar Rapids and owner of "Uncle Josh" and "Skylight," was robbed of $270 in cash.

A special election was held in Waverly to levy a 2-mill tax for the purpose of buying real estate for a park, and resulted in a majority of 200 in favor of the tax.

At the close of the retreat of the sisters of St. Francis, at Dubuque, conducted at the German Catholic Orphan Asylum, 13 young ladies were received into the order as novices by Bishop Hennessy.

Edward Langworthy, one of the very first settlers of Dubuque, celebrated his 83d birthday. Among the presents received by him was a check for $25.50, the amount of a bill sold a woman 47 years ago when he was in business.

Bott Bros', shoe store was burgarlized. at Dubuque. Entrance was made from an adjoining store and thence through a skylight. The safe was pried open and $225 taken, together with other valuables.

Alonzo Nicholls, living about 16 miles from Waverly, while trying to dynamite the Wapsu river for fish, received serious injuries from the explosion of the bomb. His right eye was put out, a hand was severed and a large hole blown in his right side. He is not expected to live.

A farmer named David King, of Algona, was worked by sharpers for $2,000. They bought his farm and worked him for a loan of money until they could go to town and have some imaginary draft cashed. On the way to town they suddenly decamped, leaving King to attend to getting the drafts cashed. It is rumored that the men were caught in Eagle Grove.

Isaac Lambert, an old soldier and pensioner, was arrested at Keokuk for kidnapping his own child. He has been a divorced man some time, his wife having since married. It is charged that Lambert on July 28 last appeared in Louisiana, where his wife is now living, and kidnaped the child, bringing him to Keokuk. His whereabouts was subsequently learned and the arrest made by Louisiana officers and Lambert was taken to Louisiana.

NOT UP TO STANDARD.

An Urchin Teaches a Dude a Lesson He Will Not Forget.

Among the crowd watching the firemen at work on the burning Sixth-avenue carstables stood a young swell. "Why are those firemen taking it easy upon the roof instead of going to work he growled.

As his remark seemed to be addressed to no one in particular, a little boy, with bare feet and a very dirty face, volunteered the information that the firemen referred to were not "taking it easy," but had crawled out of the smoke for a breath of fresh air. "Day couldn't live, boss, if dey stayed in dere right 'long," he said.

"Wait until you are spoken to," said the dandified young man, at the same time tapping the boy on the shins with a cane he carried. The little fellow knew his brown fist was no match for the heavy-headed walking-stick and said nothing, but the light in his bright young eyes spoke volumes.

In a brief space of time the young man had forgotten all about the occurrence and again spoke aloud, this time addressing his remark to a pretty girl who stood at his side: "I'm glad I am not a fireman. I couldn't be one, don't you know; I really couldn't."

Immediately the thin voice of the small boy replied: "Naw, yer couldn't. They only have brave fellers in the Fire Department, an' a feller of yer size as would hit a little un like me ain't no good, See?" At this out-burst the pretty young lady turned a rosy red, and her escort evidently wished her many miles away as he fondled his cane and glared at the grinning face of the retreating boy.—N. Y. Irish Puns.

Charles Lamb made some famous puns, and, according to the London Truth, his mantle seems to have fallen upon his namesake, Mr. Charles Lamb Kenny.

The popular journalists just mentioned was dining at the house of a friend; and by chance swallowed a bit of cork with his wine, which gave him a severe coughing fit.

"Take care, my friend," said his next neighbor, with a very brilliant attempt at witticism; "that's not the way for cork.

"No," gasped the sufferer, "it's the way to kill Kenny."

AN IOWA CYCLONE.

It Swoops Down on a Grove in Which a Camp Meeting Is Being Held.

Huge Trees Felled and Broken Branches Hurled Through the Assemblage.

LEON, IOWA, Aug. 11.—A cyclone swept over this portion of Decatur county yesterday, causing great damage. In this town the streets and yards were literally littered with fallen trees and in many instances the roads were absolutely impassable. School houses were unroofed and two houses in the southern part of the town were completely demolished. Fences, sidewalks and outhouses were lifted up bodily and carried away by the wind. The falling trees wrecked the telegraph, telephone and electric light wires and the town was in darkness last night.

About half of the citizens of this place were attending a camp meeting at Davis City, ten miles distant. The camp meeting is being held in a grove on the banks of Grand river. Fully 8,000 people were in attendance.

The storm struck the grove suddenly, and in a moment all was dark. Huge forest trees fell crashing to the earth, and broken branches were hurled by the wind through the crowded assemblage with terrific force. The tabernacle was crushed under the weight of two giant oaks, and all the seats and stands demolished. Several cottages were also damaged, some being unroofed and others being crushed by fallen trees. In spite of the suddenness and force of the gale, however, no one was killed and only a few slightly bruised by falling debris.

It is feared that when reports are received from the country districts they will bring news of loss of life. Such news as has been received is to the effect that the damage to crops is heavy. Corn has been beaten to the earth, stacks blown away and fences demolished.

A LODGING HOUSE FIRE.

Two of the Inmates Were Killed and Several Injured.

SPOKANE FALLS, Wash., Aug. 11.—Early this morning a fire broke out in Conway's lodging house. The building was soon a mass of flames and the inmates barely escaped. One person has not yet been accounted for, and it is thought he has perished in the burning house.

Charles Johnson, sixty years of age, was taken out through a second-story window. He had been suffocated to death. A negro barber named Washington had his hands and arms fearfully burned, the skin being entirely peeled off. His burns are fatal. A man named Green jumped from the third story of the building and sustained serious internal injuries. J. H. Dwyer, another inmate, jumped from the third story, receiving a broken arm. William Clifford and Frank Brown also jumped from the same story and escaped unhurt.

The house was a three-story frame and was completely gutted. The fire is supposed to be of incendiary origin.

HEAVY WIND BUT NO RAIN.

OTTUMWA, Iowa, Aug. 11.—Yesterday afternoon a tornado did considerable damage in this vicinity to crops, buildings and other property. The course of the storm was from the southwest toward the northeast. The first damage done by it was at Humeston, where the wind was most furious. Cars standing on the Keokuk & Western track were blown off, several roofs were lifted and other damrge done. At Centerville several buildings were unroofed and barns and other structures demolished. The path of the storm through the country has been marked by the destruction of corn and the demolition of grain in stack. There was very little rain, and the damage was wholly by wind. The storm also swept over Davis and Decatur counties, and raged in the vicinity of Burlington, doing considerable damage to crops and fruit trees.

STRUCK BY JOVE'S BOLTS.

CHICAGO, Aug. 11.—Yesterday was the hottest day of the year, the signal service thermometer marking 96 deg. About 5 o'clock dark storm clouds gathered and a brisk wind storm came from the Northwest, accompanied by rain and heavy peals of thunder. The temperature dropped 20 deg. in fifteen minutes. Several houses were struck by lightning, and one house was fired by a bolt and destroyed. William Collins, a teamster, was struck by lightning and killed. Two large electric balls struck and exploded in Hermitage avenue, throwing a number of people to the ground, and severely shocking others.

OTTAWA, Ill., Aug. 11—A terrible storm swept over this section last evening. At Rand's Grove, where a picnic was in progress, Gustave Breining of Peru, a member of the County board of supervisors, was instantly killed, and George Soedler, also of Peru, seriously injured by lightning. Lightning also struck five buildings in this city, but no great damage is reported.

SCORED CITY OFFICIALS.

The Taxpayers of Kansas City, Kan., Get After the Council.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Aug. 11.—The mayor and council of the city of Kansas City, Kan., barely escaped vengeance to-night at the hands of a crowd of 800 taxpayers. The excitement arose over the proposition of the city council to purchase the plant of the Consolidated Electric Light and Power company for $340,000. There was much public indignation over the proposition.

The indignation culminated to-night when a mass meeting of the tax-payers was held to protest against the proposed purchase. A committee of fifteen was appointed to call at the council chamber and protest before the ordinance could be passed. The crowd also joined the committee.

As the city hall was reached the excitement became great, until the anger of the crowd finally culminated in shouts of "lynch them," "hang them." In the meantime the council had been informed of the approach of the mod and hastily adjourned.

CAMP DOUGLAS IN RUINS.

The Fire Fiend Wipes Out That Thriving Wisconsin Village.

NEW LISBON, Wis., Aug. 11.—Camp Douglas is in ruins. At 9 p. m. the cry of fire was raised. It seems that a lamp exploded in McGuire's saloon, but the flames had been nearly smothered, and thinking it was over, left. The fire took a new start, and in about ten minutes was beyond control. It appeared rapidly through several houses till it reached Camp Douglass Hotel. It then crossed the Omaha tracks and set fire to the Commercial House and the depot. Although all this happened in a very few minutes the soldiers at the camps had been notified and they had assembled and succeeded in saving nearly all the goods in the hotels and stores, besides the whole of the business part of the village.

Many dwelling houses were burned, there being nothing left but a few residences in the southwestern part of town. The wind blew from the south and kept it burning so rapidly that the fire engines from Mau-ton had been sent for as soon as it was evident that the fire had a good start, but reached there too late. Total loss estimated at about $150,000.

Some of the losses are as follows: George F. Rohmader, general merchandise $8,000; Buff McGuire, saloon and dwelling, $1,500; Johnson's store building and stock, $10,000; Lynn hotel, $5,000; Singleton's hotel and store property, $25,000, and Holton's warehouse and other buildings, $7,000. Hansen's livery barn was burned with two horses. Telegraph lines and railroad tracks are in such condition that they cannot be used. Linemen and section men are on hand, but the roadmaster says nothing can be done till morning owing to the heat. Traffic wont be opened till to-morrow.

NOT IN CONTEMPT.

Montana's Supreme Court Orders Editor MacKnight's Discharge.

HELENA, Mont., Special Telegram, Aug. 11.—The supreme court of Montana to-day vindicated the right of a newspaper to publish the news. Judge McHatton of Butte recently hauled up Editor A. MacKnight, of the Helena Journal, for publishing in a gossipy article the words of "an old Montanian" to the effect that the Davis will contestants could not get an impartial trial before any judge or jury in Butte, where the vast estate lies, and from which it would be removed if the contest is successful.

The court held that contempt of court is confined almost exclusively to acts that interrupt the progress of the business of the court. "We are passing upon a question of law as between the right of a citizen and the power of the court to summarily imprison upon a charge of contempt. The power is given to the court to enforce obedience and respect to the authority of the court. It is not to enforce sentimental respect, for that must be gained by other means, and will come to a court where law and order is administered with able, fearless and impartial fidelity."

The decision is quite a sweeping one, as the article certainly went to the limit in its reflections on the court. The prisoner was ordered discharged.

MORE MUST DIE.

Viceroy Lansdowne Decides Against Authors of the Manipur Massacre.

SIMLA, Aug. 11.—The Marquis of Lansdowne, viceroy of India, has rendered his decision on the appeal of the Manipur princes who were condemned to death for the part they took in the massacre of Chief Commissioner Quilon, Special Agent Grimwood and other British civil and military officers at Manipur in March last, the technical charge on which they were convicted being that they had waged a war against the queen and murder.

The accused were tried by a military court of inquiry. The sentences of Selna Putty, brother of the jubraj (regent) of Manipur and commander in chief of the Manipur army, and the general who give the order for the massacre have been confirmed by the viceroy and they will be executed. In the cases of the regent and Prince Anango Sena, the younger Sena Putty, the viceroy has commuted the sentences of death to transportation for life and the forfeiture of their property. Several of the Manipuri and a British Sepoy who took a prominent part in the massacre have already been executed.

FELL AMONG THIEVES.

A Montana Man Held Up in an Eau Claire Park Drive.

EAU CLAIRE, Wis., Special Telegram, Aug. 11.—A woman whose name is not known and one Bellesbach, a hackdriver, are in jail on the charge of highway roobery. It is claimed by C. J. Forrest, who formerly lived here and has just come back from Montana, that he and the woman went for a hack drive Friday night, that in a dark place in the Putnam Park drive the hack stopped and the driver got down and demanded $5 for hack hire; that immediately another man came out of the bushes, presented a revolver at Forrest and made him give up about $240, and that the woman and the driver were accessories and got up the plot. The man with the revolver has not been seen since as far as known.

The woman formerly appeared as an Albino in the side show and rode the elephant in Forepaugh's circus parade, and she sang one night here in the chorus of the Shaw Opera company.

It is said Forrest had $1,000 in money on his person at the time.

The woman is said to have gone by the name of Melnotte.

Russia's Bad Fix.

ST. PETERSBURG, Aug. 11.—The Grasdannin, in an editorial to-day regarding the failure of crops in certain provinces of Russia and the grain corner which has been progressing for the past two weeks, declares that the local administrations will be unable to make provision for the inhabitants of the distressed provinces by drawing upon the surplus of other provinces if speculators are allowed to export corn or if the artificial rise in the price of corn is not checked. The paper demands that the government immediately place a heavy export duty on rye. The Financial Messenger declares that it will be almost impossible for Russia to export corn this year. It is officially announced that the government has not yet contemplated issuing a decree totally prohibiting the exportation of grain from Russia, but the partial failure of crops demands that provision be made for the people living in the distressed provinces, and consequently the exportation of grain from those provinces will be restricted by the authorities.

Denver's Boodlers.

DENVER, Aug. 11.—The committee which has been investigating the office of city treasurer for the past ten weeks filed its report with Mayor Rogers to-day. The report shows that the city has been defrauded out of $26,148.45. The alleged frauds occurred during the administration of ex-City Treasurer Place, and the alleged crookedness consisted in the raising and altering of bills and vouchers for supplies furnished the city by various merchants. The report is said to implicate every member of the old city administration except ex-Mayor Londoner, as well as several prominent business men. The report will be placed in the hands of the grand jury for action.

A STRANGE EXPERIENCE.

It happened when I was in college, and the subject had been brought up by a little discussion in the mental philosophy class, where we strayed away from the lesson proper to certain facts and theories relating to abnormal conditions of the mind. The trend of thought had been toward that borderland where the natural merges into the suprenatural, or at least takes on certain mysterious characterics. Probably all such manifestations may be explained by natural laws, and will be better appreciated when the suspected sixth sense reaches a higher state of development; but the uncertainty of their operation lends a delightful mystery to their discussion.

The evening following this desultory lecture on psychology, my chum, Ellen Fay, and myself threw aside our German grammars and lexicons with our lessons half prepared, and in study gowns and slippers drew our easy chairs to the grate to discuss further the fascinating study in abnormal conditions of the mind. An hour or more had passed in conversation, when, with the sort of feeling that makes children creep close to the brightest spot by the fireside after the recital of some thrilling ghost story, we drew a little closer to the fire with a side glance at the half-open door, and the long dark corridor outside. We sat silent for a little while when Ellen said in a slow dreamy fashion:

"Yes, it is very strange."

"What is strange?" I questioned sharply.

Ellen started.

"I thought you were speaking of Mr. and Mrs. Kimball," she said, looking at me with strangely brilliant eyes.

"I was thinking of them," I replied, "but I did not speak. I was thinking how strange it is that so handsome a man should have married a woman so exceedingly plain."

Ellen turned pale.

"Were you truly, Mattie?" she said. "I know, now, that you did not speak; but that thought was, somehow, presented to my mind as clearly as if you had actually spoken."

This was bringing our psychology studies too near home. I shook off the little shivers that were trembling down my spine, and rushed to the half open door, shutting it with a bang that sent the echoes trembling, down the silent hall.

"Come, Ellen, let's go to bed. You look like a ghost, and I certainly feel like one after such an unearthly evening. I believe I prefer normal to abnormal manifestation, myself," and I bustled around with unusual energy to make preparation for retiring.

Ellen roused herself, too, and we had soon disposed of ourselves for the night, as we supposed; but we both lay restless and wakeful, not daring to talk lest we should revert to the fascinating subject which had already unnerved us.

The night was still, soft winter night, with a full moon shining upon the spotless snow. We loved to lie with the moonlight streaming into the room, and I knew Ellen's strong nerves must be unusually tense when she said fretfully.

"Can't you draw the blind down, Mattie, I can't sleep in this insufferable light."

I reached out for the cord when she sat up in bed, her eyes shining, her hands cold and the vibration of a tremendous will-power in her voice.

"It's no use, Mattie, I must go. It's the very height of absurdity, but I can't help it."

"Go! go where?" I asked, all my sharpness and latent common sense aroused.

"Somebody wants me down there near the bridge, I must go, Mattie, I must go."

I remonstrated in vain. I did not soften my opposition with any sympathy for her ridiculous notion. My will was the stronger and I could usually persuade her into my way of thinking, but to all my arguments she made no reply. She got up and began to dress.

"I wish you would go with me, Mattie," she said coolly. "You know I am such a coward."

I was dressing, too, as fast as my trembling fingers would let me, for I am free to confess that my nerves had completely surrendered.

"I'll go of course, if you go," I said, "but I'll refer the preceptress to you for an explanation, if the faculty get hold of this escapade."

Ellen said nothing in reply but brought out cloaks, overshoes and long hooded water-proffs from the closet. In a few moments we were creeping stealthily through the halls with our hoods drawn close around our faces, we exchanged the darkness of the corridor for the brightness of the moonlit walk.

We made our exit through a small, private door, opening into the kitchen garden, and we were obliged to climb the high, close fence surrounding it to get into the street. Muffled up as we were it was not an easy performance, but we finally accomplished it.

Once upon the street we walked rapidly but silently toward the little bridge which Ellen spoke of, a slight structure thrown across a ravine, which a few rods below opened upon the river.

As we reached the bridge we saw a man coming swiftly toward us. Ellen seized my arm with a clutch that left its mark for several days, but I was too excited to feel the pain which such a grasp must have occasioned. We dared not turn back and could only meet what seemed to us, at that moment, an awful destiny sweeping down upon us. The spot was an intensely lovely one for a busy and populous city. Behind us lay the college grounds quiet and deserted, with the angular buildings rising cold and forbidding among the leafless trees. In front lay a narrow, gloomy street while at our left the dark river roared foaming between the rows of great factories and mills. No policeman was in sight, not a creature disturbed the silence of the midnight except our trembling selves and the man coming toward us with such reckless haste. He did not see us until quite near and then half-stopped with a muttered imprecation; but quickly collected himself and walked rapidly past us. The moonlight fell full upon his face for the moment that he stopped, and Ellen's grip upon my arm was tightened. No wonder. It was Mr. Kimball. He walked slowly until he had turned around a corner, out of sight, and then we turned and ran like a pair of frightened rabbits. We clambered over the kitchen-garden fence with more haste than dignity, stole in through the little door and crept like a couple of sneak thieves up to our room.

"I am glad we are out of that scrape," I gasped.

Ellen smiled a peculiar smile.

"And I, too," she said.

We went to bed again, and to sleep this time. The next morning the sun rose as usual; the cold gray of the morning toned down the high coloring of the midnight adventure, and the ordinary routine of work began again with nothing out of the usual way except that Ellen and I both answered "unprepared" in German. The professor looked at us searchingly over his glasses. Whether or not our faces betrayed any unusual emotion, I cannot say, but I know my heart was throbbing in a very erratic manner.

It was our secret, that escapade. Sometimes we met Mr. Kimball and his wife, for they seemed to be inseparable, and Ellen would flash me a glance of mock tragedy from her black eyes. We even gave a name to the little episode. We called it the Strange Experience and then abbreviated to "S. E.," to the mystification of our friends. By and by our college days were ended. We separated and the strange experience passed out of our minds and lives.

⁂

A dozen years later Ellen Fay, now Ellen Thompson, came to make me a visit. The slender, big-eyed girl had developed into a handsome matron. Much of what we used to call "spirituality" had vanished from her face, but it had gained in strength and repose, and she was the same genial, delightful friend as of old.

One evening we denied ourselves to all our little world, and safely hidden behind the portiere of the study, we thought we could devote ourselves to reminiscences. Both our lives had been very full and busy and the present had so fully occupied us that we had not spared an hour to those dear days of our early friendship until this evening, when we deliberately barred out everything and everybody, determined to devote this time at least to our college days.

Ellen very nearly filled the great easy chair, but her slippered feet upon the fender, still slender and dainty, suddenly recalled to me that evening when we sat in that same fashion, by the fire in the "Ladies Dormitory" of C—— College, and talked about "supernatural manifestations. I laughed quietly to myself as I inquired:

"Ellen, do you remember the 'Strange Experience?"

Ellen smiled ever so slightly and then looked sober.

"It is the one thing in my life that I cannot understand," she said. "Did you ever hear the sequel?"

"The sequel? No, indeed. Is there a sequel?" I asked incredulously.

"Yes, there is a sequel, and a very remarkable one. You may call it a coincidence, if you like, but I must confess to have felt a sort of creeping sensation when I heard it. About two years ago I met a lady at a dinner party whose face seemed strangely familiar but whose identity was completely lost. She was dressed plainly in black and her hair was quite white although her face was not old. I was so tormented by the half-knowledge of her face that I asked our hostess to present me to her.

"'Ah, you noticed her. She certainly has a remarkable face and her history corresponds to it. This is the first time she has come out since her husband's death.'

"'Her face seems familiar. I think I must have met her before.'

"By this time we had reached her. She was the center of a brilliant and animated group and appeared to be the leader in the conversation. Her face was a study. It made me think of a battle-field where the cannon were half hidden by the spring flowers, and the graves were seen only as green undulations. At the first available opportunity my friend presented her as Mrs. Kimball. Instantly I knew where I had seen her. We talked a little as people do at such places and parted, with the determination on my part to know her better.

"My friend had certainly described her face in calling it remarkable.' You know we used to think her very plain, almost ugly. In fact the 'strange experience' hinged upon our simultaneous thought in that very particular." Ellen laughed a little, softly, and then went on.

"She did not seem to me nearly as plain as I had remembered her. Her gray hair softened the effect of her face, I think, and that alert suspicious glance that used to so amuse us was quite gone. She had the chastened look of one who had come up through great tribulation. I found her quite accessible, indeed, glad to make new friends in a strange city, and when she found that I had spent four years in C—— she treated me like an old, familiar friend. She was usually quite reserved, but she gave me her confidence with at least no conscious effort on my part to gain it. Naturally, I felt interested in her, particularly as we girls used to speculate so much about her and her husband, and I suppose I may as well confess to a little curiosity at the bottom; but as soon as I had learned to know her, I loved her too well to wish to pry into her secrets. Little by little, however, she told me about herself. I will condense the story for you."

"You needn't," I answered. "It's as interesting to me as a 'to-be-continued-in-our-next.'"

Ellen gave her shoulders that little deprecating shrug that used to be so charming when she weighed a hundred pounds or so, and went on with her story.

"She was an orphan and an heiress. She had been educated on rather a severe plan, and her education instead of softening her angularities of face and disposition, had intensified them. All the latent nobility of her nature was smothered in the oppressive moral atmosphere in which she had been reared. An ill-dispositioned relative had impressed upon her mind from her earliest youth that no man would ever marry a person of her facial and mental obliquities except for her money, and she was exhorted to be thankful that providence had not altogether forgotten to provide her with attraction. Naturally under such assurance she avoided society and hated men, and looked with suspicion upon any friendly advances. Sometimes she hated her money and laid plans for founding some great charity with it and then retiring into obscurity. Sometimes she gloried in it because it gave her power—the only power she was ever likely to know—and once she forgot it."

Ellen contemplated her last sentence with the complete understanding of a woman whose married life had been much more than the fulfillment of the hopes of her betrothal.

"Yes, she forgot it, and herself. She forgot that she was plain angular and unlovely. She knew only that she was loved and beloved. One man had penetration enough to see through the reserves with which she had hedged herself about, and to discover a sensitive, loving, noble nature behind this environment. They were married. Unfortunately, her husband was poor and handsome, but they lived a whole year in Paradise, and then the serpent introduced himself.

"One day she overheard a pretty little woman exclaim, 'Heavens, how could so handsome a man marry so ugly a woman?' Her husband heard it, too, and turned to her with some laughing remark upon his lips, but he did not utter it. 'No doubt I looked ugly enough at that moment to have justified any comparison,' she said. She insisted upon their leaving home and seeking new associations. Then they came to C—. Her husband cared for her with the most tender affection, thinking this sudden change must be due to some derangement of the nervous system. He consulted physicians. Those who were shrewd enough to discover the truth, dared not tell him their conclusions. The demon of jealously was aroused and all the peace offerings made but added fuel to the angry flames. She had given all. It was one daring venture of her life and she deemed that it had failed. She told me that it was simply torture for her to cross the college grounds with her husband, for all the girlish faces they met so constantly confessed an involuntary admiration of her husband, and a surprise at the contrast with herself. How well I remembered, when she told me that, how the girls used to 'rave' as we said in those days about the handsome, dark-browed man who never even glanced at any of us, and whose mind was evidently far enough away from his own perfections, or the admiration of a lot of silly girls.

"What her life was at that time I suppose only a strong, passionate nature like her own can possibly comprehend. I hope I may never know." Ellen gave a little shudder.

"Her husband's life was as wretched as her own. His position laid him open to the suspicion of having married her for her money, and I suppose there was no cruel, bitter taunt that she left unsaid. Talk about a hell," said Ellen reflectively, "It does not seem possible that there can be a much worse one than two natures like Mr. and Mrs. Kimball's are capable of making for each other.

"So things went on from bad to worse until life became a torture for them both, and one night her husband, who by the way must have certainly been an exceptional man, for the first and last time was stunk into replying to her cruel words. He left the house in a white heat of anger, and told her that she need never expect to see his face again, that she might reserve her suspicions for someone more worthy of them. She followed him, cowering under his passion, not daring to call after him; her heart filled with a terrible fear. Just at the corner, in the shadow of the church, her strength gave way. She could not speak nor move, but her whole life was concentrated in her eyes, as she watched him going to the mad surrender of his unhappy life. Her whole soul was in an agony of supplication for some one to stop him, to save him, and just then two dark figures came in sight. A flood of tears relieved the istensity of her feelings. She felt that he was saved. She saw her husband hesitate as the two passed him. She saw him stop again at the end of the bridge where the little foot-path led down to that torrent of roaring waters, and then go irresolutely on, and then she crawled back to her desolate home.

"That was the last she knew for many weeks. When she came back to the world upon whose threshold she had lingered so long, her husband sat beside her. When she was strong enough he told her all. How the two dark-robed women on the bridge had caused him to postpone his dark intention, how a walk of a block or two had brought him into the companionship of a belated acquaintance. How his better judgment came back as the heat of his passion died, and he had made some excuse for his untimely appearance, and had consented to pass the rest of the night with his friend, and how in the early morning a messenger sought him out, saying that his wife was very sick and knew no one; how, through those long, delirious weeks he had learned that the bitterness of her jealousy was but the excess of her love, and how he comprehended for the first time what her life had been and what his love had meant to her, and then—there was peace between them. Even when death parted them she could say that it was less bitter than that first terrible experience. 'He is mine still,' she says with that quiet assurance that one cannot doubt."

Ellen leaned back in her chair and crossed her plump, white hands.

"Did you tell her your part in what came so near being a tragedy?" I asked.

Again Ellen shrugged her plump shoulders.

"No, I couldn't;" and then with a little laugh, "It was a case where the sublime was terribly near the ridiculous, and—with my avoirdupois—"

I laughed with her, but only said:

"There seems to be no occasion to change the name of our little adventure."—Fanny Earl in Milwaukee Wisconsin.

The Balls Were Hollow.

Yesterday morning a man went into John Donnelly's place on Adams street, picked up a quarrel with John, and, pulling from his overcoat pocket what looked like a composition pool ball, he threw it at the big mirror behind the bar. John yelled and dodged, but the ball rebounded and fell to the floor doing no harm. It was light and hollow, being constructed of colored celluloid, but it looked like a heavy, solid ball. The same man had a pocket full of these bogus balls. He went up to Tom Foley's rooms and showed them to Tom. Well, Tom had an idea. He called the young fellow who mans his pool table and he whispered in his ear. Then he handed him a basket filled with these celluloid balls. The young man took them, placed them in the triangle on the table, and then Tom waited for a game. About 1 o'clock in came two famous pool players from a wholesale house near by. One of them had to "bust" and he fired away with the solid ball. When it hit the hollow celluloid balls they went all over the room. Six of them fell on tables where others were playing billiards, while the rest ran all around the floor.—Chicago Herald.

The Figure Nine.

From the Chicago Herald.

I wonder if any one besides myself has ever noticed the peculiarities of the numeral 9? That when an error has arisen from any transposition of figures the difference between such transposed numbers of figures is universally a multiple of the number 9? For instance, suppose an error occurs in bringing out a trial balance or cash settlement of the amount in question, or that the sum short or over can be divided by 9 without any remainder, there is a strong probability that the mistake has been made by transposing figures; at any rate, if such mistake takes place by reason of transposition, the sum in question will divide by 9 without remainder, To illustrate this: If 97 has been put down 79, the error will be 18, or twice 9 exactly; if 322 be set down 223, the error will be 99 or 11x9, and so on between any transposed numbers. These errors are prevalent, and 9 is a first-class detective to ferret them out.

Nothing New Under the Sun.

James E. Umbstaetter tells a story which illustrates one of the tricks in the patent business. He wears a peculiar, old-fashioned chain, with a ring for a fob, hanging from a vest button hole. It was given to him by his father, who had worn it many years. A day or two ago he visited a jewelry store and asked to be shown some watch chains. The urbane clerk handed out a tray, and, holding one chain delicately between his thumb and forefinger, said: "There is the latest thing out. It has just been patented." "Why, it's just like the one I wear," Mr. Umbstaetter said, and he compared the chains. The designs were identical, but the new patent was bona fide.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Official Paper of the City.

Death comes through every channel imaginable but it will be sure financial death to every farmer who votes in favor of strapping a debt upon his own back. Vote against the bonds.

Every paper in Polk County outside of Crookston is opposed to the scheme of placing a debt of $500,000 upon the tax payers of the county.

A girl in Ohio recently sneezed to death. She no doubt, had been in Crookston and got a sniff of the corrupt methods in vogue with the schemes to bond Polk County for $500,000.

The senatorial boom which agitated the state press so long seems to have busted. The last heard of it Senator Davis was securing fat jobs for alliance men. It needs alliance vote to secure the senatorial toga the next six years.

The agreement with the D. & D. R. R. Co. would never have been accepted had not the chairman of the county commissioners seconded the motion to adopt the resolution. It's vrey seldom we find a chairman who will overstep the bonds of parlamentary law as did this gentleman. Mike however was bound the agreement should be accepted and this gave us this exemplification of purely unadulterated gall. We admire the man in this instance for his bounteous cheek. We have never seen as much brass displayed as this chairman of our county commissioners who might write a revised code of parliamentary rules for the benefit of others who would in the future desire to accept agreements with defunct railroads.

Gone to Her Rest.

Mrs. Frank J. Duffy, of East Grand Forks, wife of the edit orof the Courier, died suddenly last Thursday morning, of heart trouble. Her friends in this city were shocked at the sad news, conveyed through the medium of the press. Mrs. Duffy, whose name was Mary Frances McCabe, was known to the writer in her girlhood's days. Her many lovable qualities were admired by all and years had no effect in lessening that admiration borne of gentle virtues. Refined and educated, the possessor of talent such as nature seldom bestows. she was a model wife and mother. Her Christian spirit will be a solace to the bereaved husband and parents and in this she will comfort their wounded sorrow and bind their broken hearts. Her remains were taken to Watertown, Wisconsin, the home of her youth, where the tears of those who shared her childhood's joys will drop as pure mementoes to her whose life was pure, simple and sublime, enshrined with all sacred virtues.

Vo e Them Down.

We this week publish the proposition of and agreement with the Duluth and Dakota railroad officials because it is alleged the legality of the election requires its publication. We do not believe the agreement is worth the paper it is written on so far as binding the D. & D. railroad to perform any specified act in the future. The parties binding themselves can at any time dispose of their road, thus making void the agreement. We have said before that any of the companies now operating roads in Polk county can at any time purchase the Duluth & Winnipeg, thus annulling the agreement with the D. & D. as the latter road would have no outlet to Duluth. Again, one or more new counties are liable at the next session of the legislature to be taken from the territory now comprising Polk county. Would it be reasonable to expect this D. & D. road to carry grain from the new counties at the reduced rates? They do not bind themselves to carry grain from other thanPolk county, but the two thousand tax payers who last winter signed a petition for county division would nevertheless be compelled to stand their just share of the indebtedness of the whole territory and a portion of this amount would be the bonded indebtedness incurred to have this road built to Crookston and old Polk county. Who is to receive this $220,000 in bonds? May it not be a scheme to entice either of the old roads to purchase the present Duluth & Winnipeg—it is currently reported that some of the strongest advocates now working for the bonds are in the employ of the Great Northern. We know of two of the leaders who to-day are traveling on passes furnished by the Great Northern. All in all it is a mysterious scheme to heap an indebtedness upon the taxpayers of Polk county—one under which they will groan for twenty years. When the people of this county are blessed with an abundant crop, railroads will build within our confines without asking the people to bond themselves in aid of such roads. When the time comes for voting see that your ballot reads against the proposition to issue bonds.

A Disinterested Opinion.

The following communication has been sent us from a county official in Wisconsin, who knows whereof he speaks. There is much wisdom in his words—he speaks from experience:

STEVENS POINT, Portage Co., Wis.
August 20th, 1891.

EDITOR RED LAKE FALLS NEWS:

Your valuable paper informs me that a proposition is soon to be submitted to the residents of Polk county as to whether they will or will not vote a bonded indebtedness upon themselves to aid in the construction of a railroad. To any who have not considered the injuries which a bonded debt inflicts upon any community so as to enable them to energetically vote "No" to the proposition I would refer them to the condition of this county as a sample of the folly of taxing themselves to aid railroads. Twenty years ago the condition of this county was similar to yours. A proposition was presented to it to vote its bonds to aid the W. C. R. R., a land grand road. $100,000 was asked and voted. In a short time another $100,000 was asked and the vote carried by votes fraudulently imported by the paid agents of the company. The people sought redress for this fraud but the company was too smart for them and they were beaten in the courts. As a consequence they have now a debt of $200,000 upon which the taxpayers have already paid at least $260,000, in interest alone. Twenty years ago of course the people thought they wanted a railroad to carry their wheat to market and get a comfortable ride to other places. They reasoned that by bonding the county they could have the benefit of the road and the road would enhance the value of their farms and their children could pay the debt—but these ideas were all visions. The farms are no more valuable to-day than twenty years ago. The climate has changed and wheat cannot be profitably raised except in small quantities for home use. The people are taxed year after year for nothing. The next generation cannot pay the debt any better than this. Railroads will always go where the products of the country will pay for transportation facilities without the people mortgaging their homes to bring them. Voting bonds they are helping to build up an aristocracy of bond holders to live upon the sweat and toil of this generation and the unborn generations to come. The advice of one who speaks from experience is Don't bond your county. Vote No.

A Citizen Speaks.

From the Fertile Journal.

Editor Journal: We as taxpayers of Polk county, have before us at present, a proposition that should receive our careful consideration.

People are too apt to view such matters as these with indifference until it is too late, when as the young housewife they cry over spilt milk. I have received one of the circulars that are now being distributed throughout the county and in it I find the benefits of the proposed railroad very coaxingly presented.

Now let us look at the other side of the question. We are asked to give bonds to the amount of two hundred and twenty thousand dollars, on twenty years time, at five per cent. interest. We then see that when the specified time has elapsed and the bonds redeemed, four hundred and forty thousand dollars will have passed from our county treasury into the coffers of the Duluth & Dakota railway company.

After allowing an exaggerated sum for incorporated towns, we find that there will be placed on every township in the county a burden of over two thousand dollars. This amount at five per cent for specified time will be four thousand dollars. Now I wish to know how the townships located outside of the teaming limits of the proposed railroad are to be reimbursed for these four thousand dollars. The circular says through competition and lower rates. But I ask, are not the N. P. and G. N. railroad companies sharp enough to see that the outsiders are dependent on them for connections, and are the two last named companies so big hearted as to allow their cars loaded with wheat to go to Duluth over their competitor's road for the sake of lower rates for the farmers? I don't think they are built that way.

The shares promised in the company's stock serve as a very good bait, but my opinion is that the county should keep out of rail road speculations. We have that branch of our government for a far different purpose.

Now I do not mean to oppose projects that are to benefit the community on the whole, but projects for which the many are to be taxed for the benefit of the few, are unjust, and one of these is the project now pending.

A LIBERTKONIAN.

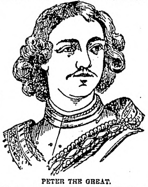
Anctual work being performed by the Great Northern Rail Road company should be sufficient to put a quietus on those who think it's a scheme to defeat the D.& D. bonds.

GOING BACK TO MOSCOW.

THE CZAR OF RUSSIA WILL ABANDON ST. PETERSBURG.

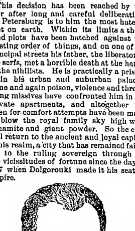
He Intends to Restore to the "Holy City" of the Plain Its Ancient Rights and Privileges as the Capital of the Muscovite Empire.

Peter the Great built St. Petersburg on a marsh and made it the capital of the Russian empire. Now Alexander III has arranged to abandon the city created by his illustrious predecessor. Within a twelvemonth he intends to restore to Moscow its pristine glory as the center of Slavonic power. There he will live, and from that historic and "holy town" of old Russia he will issue the edicts, ukases and mandates which are to affect the living and the dying of 100,000,000 of human beings.



PETER THE GREAT.

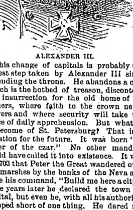
This decision has been reached by the czar after long and careful deliberation. St. Petersburg is to him the most hateful spot on earth. Within its limits a thousand plots have been hatched against the existing order of things, and on one of its principal streets his father, the liberator of the serfs, met a horrible death at the hands of the nihilists. He is practically a prisoner in his urban and suburban palaces. Time and again poison, violence and threatening missives have confronted him in his private apartments, and altogether too often for comfort attempts have been made to blow the royal family sky high with dynamite and giant powder. So the czar will return to the ancient and loyal capital of his realm, a city that has remained faithful to the ruling sovereign through all the vicissitudes of fortune since the day in 1147 when Dolgorouki made it his seat of empire.



ALEXANDER III.

This change of capitals is probably the wisest step taken by Alexander III since ascending the throne. He abandons a city which is the hotbed of treason, discontent and insurrection for the old home of his fathers, where faith to the crown never wavers and where security will take the place of daily apprehension. But what is to become of St. Petersburg? That is a question for the future. It was born "by order of the czar." No other mandate could have called it into existence. It was in 1703 that Peter the Great wandered over the marshes by the banks of the Neva and gave his command, "Build me here a city!" Nine years later he declared the town his capital, but even he, with all his authority, stopped short of one thing. He dared not deprive Moscow of the right of the coronation, and since his time, as during the centuries before, the masters of the Muscovites have, on ascending the throne, received the crown and scepter from holy hands in Moscow's venerable and gorgeous Cathedral of the Assumption.

St. Petersburg is practically a collection of palaces. It is also the costliest capital in Europe, so far as living expenses are concerned. Situated at no great distance from the Arctic circle it has a winter thermometrical record of 51 degs. below zero. Yet it is during the winter season that it blazes with gayety, gorgeousness and extravagance.



SACRED GATE OF THE KREMLIN.

It is not so with Moscow. That venerable city is a center of trade and profitable traffic. Its merchants are known to the Pacific shores of China and to the most southern marts of India. They have in their grasp the pick of oriental commerce. They belong to the Greek church, they reverence the czar, and they can clear 50 per cent. on a bargain quicker than any other barterers on earth. They are proud, too, of their splendid town, of the great bell that stands silent on the ground, and of the other great bell that sends forth its thunder tones only in times of high import, of the university and of the churches, but more than all of the imposing district of the Kremlin, through whose sacred gate they now await with exultation the advent of Emperor Alexander, en route to the palace and the throne, about which cluster memories of 800 years of warfare, progress and conquest.

Rather Questionable Jokes.

One ducal house in Scotland has a great reputation as a resort for practical jokers, and one never knows when there at what time he may be made the butt of his fellow guests. One man who objected to be "drawn" was tabooed by the party, and strenuous efforts were made to get rid of him. But he was one of the adhesive kind. He considered that he had been invited to stay a fortnight, and a fortnight he would stay. One of the jokes played on him was to remove the buttons from all his clothes, including his trousers, a fact which he only discovered when about to dress for dinner, which necessitated the use of about three dozen catchpins to enable him to appear at the dinner table.

'Short hairs were placed in his bed. Booby traps were laid for him. His cartridges were found either dampened or else filled with sawdust. In fact everything was done to make his life a burden to him. One night he was told that the party intended to turn out and "draw" him, whereupon he barricaded the door with furniture and underwent a seige, the door being cut down with hammers and hatchets in the endeavor to get at him, the host and the hostess joining in the so called amusement.

The stout oak bureau placed against the door, however, resisted all attempts at demolishment, and the man remained comfortably ensconced in bed during the night. The next morning, when he returned from a stroll in the garden, he found all his luggage had been packed up and was down stairs in the hall waiting for him. This was too strong and he took his departure. --New York World.

Coin Operated Reversible Seat Chair.

Among the thousand and one applications of the nickle-in-the-slot principle may be mentioned a late invention, which may possibly have a curious effect on the sales of tickets in theaters. The device is a chair having a revolving seat and a revolving back, the respective position of both which can be immediately changed by coin controlled locking mechanism. Supposing that a play is in progress, and the spectator, with an eye to economy, "is taking it in" from the gallery. The seat, probably, is hard, and the back of the chair is straight, and the pleasure seeker is longing for the end of the play, so that he can seek something like comfort in his chair at home.

The dropping of the nickel now works beneficently, for as the mechanism is actuated by its weight the under side of the seat, which is softly cushioned, flies up and forms a luxurious back, with a gentle and inviting inclination, and a similarly cushioned seat is provided for the grateful playgoer for the rest of the evening. So that, in point of fact, the occupants of a gallery seat can for an extra five cents enjoy more than the comfort of those in the orchestra.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

About Shoes.

Never try to wear a shoe too small or that does not fit when first put on. Never let your shoe get hard or dry. Do not let it run down at the heel or the side. Never wear into the welt or insole. A shoe repaired in time will retain its shape and afford comfort, and will be found true economy. Never put wet shoes by the fire to dry, but dry them gradually and slowly. Never dry a wet shoe without first applying some oil or grease—castor oil or tallow is the best. The steam generated in a wet boot or shoe will scald it and cause it to crack. Do not use too much force in polishing—a gentle brushing with a soft brush is better than the vigorous work of the bootblack.

Do not allow a thick crust of blacking on your shoes. Wash it off occasionally and apply a little castor oil—you can polish it over in an hour or two. Never try on or handle a patent leather shoe when cold; always thoroughly warm it before bending the leather. A patent leather shoe put on in a warm room can be worn out in the cold weather without injury. Never put a good pair of shoes in galoches; use an old pair for this, and withdraw the galoches as soon as you enter a house.—New York Ledger.

The Matter of Names.

Nothing is more indicative of ill breeding than the familiarity with which men and women make use of each other's given names. It is well enough for schoolmates and college chums to use diminutives, or plain Mary or John, in addressing their companions, but with the other evidences of personal dignity acquired by maturity should be that of exclusiveness in the use of one's baptismal title. Not only is it well for women to refrain from using the first name of their men friends in speaking to them, but, in private as well as public a certain fine reserve is maintained by adopting this course.

It is just as easy to refer to Mr. Jones as Mr. Jones, instead of Tom, Tim or Will, only in the latter case a degree of intimacy is implied complimentary to neither party. After all, it is a mere habit, and by a little careful correction a lady will soon find herself quite as fluent in addressing and mentioning her masculine acquaintances by their correct titles as when she undignifiedly spoke of them in the same terms her cook employs in alluding to the grooms.—Chicago News.

London Uses Thirty Gallons of Ink a Day.

From the latest postal statistics it has been ascertained that out of the whole number of letters, etc., despatched to various addresses at home and abroad about 30 per cent are sent from London and its suburbs. The total of letters and postcards dispatched to foreign countries in 1888 is reported at 45,000,000, to which may be added 15,000,000 more as inland correspondence, making a total of 60,000,000 per year—which would give as London's proportion 18,000,000.

This number divided by 313 working days results in a daily average of 57,511 letters dispatched from London. To write these letters, taking them on an average at four closely written pages of note size, would consume, at the rate of fifty penfuls of ink each, equal to thirty minims, or half a dram, a total of nearly thirty gallons of ink per day.

The True Inwardness.

In the telephone an alteration of timbre, consisting of a disagreeable snuffling which distorts words, is said to be due to the fundamental note and harmonics of the diaphragm being superimposed upon those of the voice, without becoming confounded with them, and producing a disturbance of the electric waves of the movements of the diaphragm molecules, and therefore of the sound waves which reach the ear.—Boston Globe.

Hope for De Fiste.

Mrs. Drubbs—My sister is going to marry that little Mr. De Fiste. Why, he's a head shorter than she is. It's awful!

APPLAUDED THE BOYS.

A BOSTON AUDIENCE THAT RESENTED A WOMAN'S SATIRE.

A Story of Florence Marryatt's First Appearance in America—She Spoke Before an Unsympathetic Audience, and Failed to Arouse Enthusiasm.

The story published recently relative to the impressions left at Kansas City by the Yale Glee club recalls an incident which happened three or four years ago in Boston. One of the best entertainment bureaus of that city had engaged Florence Marryatt, the authoress, to give a series of entertainments in this country. She first appeared in Boston, at Tremont Temple. Every billboard throughout the city was ablaze with her portrait and the announcement of her first appearance in America, and down toward the bottom of the bill, in small and modest letters, was the further announcement that she would be "assisted by the Harvard quartet."

Boston people had been treated to a taste of English "sweetness and light" in the person of the famous English critic, Matthew Arnold, only a short time before and were, therefore, all agog with expectancy and interest as to how this English commodity would be dispensed by and English woman.

On the evening appointed Tremont Temple was packed. Every seat was occupied, and the aisles were filled with people standing up. The quartet of Harvard boys had been engaged to "sandwich in" between the numbers on the programme reserved for Miss Marryatt, and the manager felt some misgivings as to whether the boys would be able to hold their own and keep the dignified pace set by the star of the evening.

She began the entertainment by reading "Love Letters," a composition of her own. She appeared in the conventional full dress, and posed as a leader of English society reading her love letters and commenting upon the character of those who sent them, always to their disparagement.

THE RECEPTION OF THE STAR.

One of these letters was supposed to be from a newly graduated Oxford man, who had offered her in this letter his heart, hand and fortune. He came in for the lion's share of feminine sarcasm and ridicule, and was left in a sorry condition when she got through with him. She made him out an inane, conceited puppy—a mere blotch on the healthy body of society. When she had completed the autopsy she bowed herself grandly off the stage and swept into the green room with the air of a conqueror.

The audience was stupefied and dumb. Presently it occurred to somebody in one corner of the hall that it was the proper thing to applaud, for the sound of a solitary clap broke the awful stillness which followed her disappearance from the stage. The applause started from the rear, skipped over the body of the house, found two or three sympathizers on the other side of the hall, froze there and died.

The manager was frantic and scarcely knew what to say to Miss Marryatt in explanation of the cold reception given her. He kept up a frenzied dance from her room to where the college boys stood, at the other end of the hall behind the scenes, trying to console the woman and pathetically begging the boys to do their best.

"Can you hold your own?" he asked in a frightened voice.

"Yes," said the giant bass, "we'll be out in the middle of the audience before we get through."

IT WAS A COLLEGE NIGHT.

And they soon were. They first sang a popular glee and followed it up with several college songs, which called forth a storm of applause. They came out again three times in response to encores and started to respond to the fourth, when the manager begged them not to go before the audience again, beseeching them to consider Miss Marryatt's feelings.

The hurricane out in the audience died after awhile and Miss Marryatt once more appeared. This time she was enveloped in a flaming red Oxford gown and cap, and stood before the audience as a young collegian. The house immediately "caught on" to the irony of the thing and remained mute with astonishment, not knowing whether her role as a collegian meant peace or war.

A spasmodic burst of laughter in the rear, in which every one wanted to join, was, however, soon hushed, and Miss Marryatt began her lines, the tenor of which was, with a slight difference, much the same as her previous sketch, and the same cold reception was accorded her.

She left the hall in a towering rage immediately, and the college boys came on to sing once more. They were greeted with tremendous applause. They "owned the house" and every one in it. The audience was demoralized and jubilant. Women waved their handkerchiefs and men clapped their hands and pounded the floor with their sticks and feet.

When the audience arose to leave one very old man, with a happy look on his face, started for the door, leaving his aged wife to find her way out as best she could. He forgot where he was for a minute, and trolled in a quavering voice:

"I'll go no more a-roving with you, fair maid."—New York Tribune.

A Modern Army.

The thousands of agents of great journals scattered everywhere throughout the world are mobilized into a compact army, thoroughly disciplined and every man within call. The reporters and correspondents are the rank and file, the city editors and managing editors the lieutenants, the editors-in-chief the commanders and the proprietors, who furnish the funds, are the commissary officers. Like other armies, the newspaper army is divided into brigades, regiments, battalions, cavalry and infantry service. Every one has his own work to do under his own officer, and absolutely nothing is left to chance—James W. King in Philadelphia Ledger.

Near Sighted and Didn't Know It.

"I never knew until recently," said a man, "that I was slightly near sighted. I happened to put on a pair of glasses just to try them, and as they fitted my eyes the result to me was amazing. I had my eyes examined, and found that I had been near sighted for years without knowing it. I amuse myself now by looking at distant objects through my glasses, and enjoy the clearness, whereas I had always supposed, if I thought anything at all about it, that the former haze was a natural result of long distance vision."—New York Tribune.

The heaviest liabilities in the case of a bankruptcy was $55,000,000, in the case of Overend, Gurney & Co., bankers, of London, in 1866. The liquidation of the great firm of the Barings, also bankers, now proceeding, though not winding up in the bankruptcy court, may be classed under the term failures, and the liabilities are stated at the enormous sum of $105,000,000.

The Great Crevasses of Mount St. Elias.

Crossing the great snowfield forming the floor of the amphitheater were hundreds of yawning chasms, many of them twenty to forty feet in breadth and half a mile in length. These we had to cross by narrow snow bridges or follow for long distances before being able to pass around their ends. A view into the blue depths of one of these great crevasses is a sight never to be forgotten. Their lips are of white snow, festooned and overarching in a thousand fantastic forms; below, the color changes by imperceptible gradations to the deepest blue. Their extreme depths are as dark in color as the unfathomable sea. Many times their bottoms are beyond the reach of vision; again they are level floored and form a fairylike valley, with walls of sculptured crystal; in other instances they are partly filled with water of the deepest indigo, in which every detail of the fretted walls above is reflected.

Some of the larger crevasses are crossed by snow arches, thrown directly from bank to bank, and resembling in their grand proportions the natural bridge of Virginia. Our way lay for miles across this beautiful but treacherous pavement along the brink of dizzy precipices and across narrow bridges with bottomless gulfs on each hand. Although we had been living on the glaciers for weeks and had become familiar with many of their wonders, the great crevasses in the upper snow regions were so magnificent in their proportions and so wonderful in color that they called forth exclamations of admiration from every member of our party.—Israel C. Russell in Century.

Why a Rat's Teeth Grow Continually.

Certain animals have teeth which grow during all their lives. The rat and the squirrel are examples of this. Our own teeth are developed from pulps, which are absorbed and disappear after the teeth are grown, but in a rat's tooth the pulp is perpetual and is continually secreting material by which the incisor gains length. Therefore the animal is obliged to gnaw all the time to keep the tooth ground down to the proper length. It is commonly imagined that the rat keeps gnawing from pure cussedness, but such is not the case.

Sometimes it happens that the beast's upper and lower incisors do not meet properly, so that it is unable to gnaw, and its teeth keep growing around in a spiral. Cases have been known where a rat's tooth grew in this manner through its skull, so as to pierce the brain and kill the unfortunate. The biggest teeth I know of are those of the mastodon, which we have in the shape of fossils. One advantage about teeth is that they are harder than almost anything else in nature and will last longer, so that they may be picked up in an excellent state of preservation ages after the animals to which they originally belonged are dead.—Interview in Washington Star.

Goodby to the Copying Clerk.

The clerk in the lawyer's office who used to copy off all the briefs and other legal papers in a beautiful round hand that was pleasing to look at unless you really wanted to read the document is a thing of the past. There are a few specimens left, of course, but they recognize the fact that the copying clerk is a mechanism way behind the times, and they are lonesome. You will find them in the old fashioned offices, and very old and slow they are for the most part. The chances are that in the same office there is a hustling typewriter, clicking off more in half an hour than the copying clerk will get over in three times as long a time.

There is still a chance for the copying clerk to show his skill in wills. Typewritten wills are not yet in fashion. But of all the other legal papers filed in the clerk's offices of the courts at least three-quarters are typewritten. The change is appreciated. The papers filed are not half as bulky as before it took place, and they can be read through in at least a third of the time necessary to unravel the tangle of the copying clerk's round hand.—New York Times.

India Rubber in the Healing of Wounds.

A physician has hit upon an excellent way of utilizing rubber in the treatment of wounds. He places one end of the strip of rubber upon one lip of the wound, and then stretches the rubber to fasten the other end to the opposite lip. In this way he draws the severed parts closely together, and the elastic rubber continuously holds them there. The efficiency of the sheet rubber used was increased by painting it over with a thin gutta-percha cement.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

A Kiss.

ANON.

It should be a token
 Of only deep feeling,
Of affection unbroken,
 Pure attachment revealing,
Too dear should the gift be
 To lavish at will,
And the kiss of deception
 Doth poison distil.
The kiss is a token
 More sacred, my dear,
Than caressing words spoken,
 Than even the tear.
It speaks an emotion
 All others above
And should ne'er be bestowed
 Save on lips that we love.

Slander.

BETH DAY.

A friend's fair fame is a fragile thing,
 And, stabbed by a word untrue,
Though the wealth of the worlds to your aid
  you bring
You cannot remove the slanderous sting
 Nor the wrong you have done, undo.

So 'tis better to speak a kindly word
 Than to smile a knowing smile,
When the tongue of slander by malice stirred
Pours out the tale which were best unheard,
 That is filled with fraud and guile.

Thirteen Towns: Is it worth $500,000, for that is virtually what the bonds asked by the Duluth and Dakota railroad amount to, to the tax payers of Polk county to have a road run nobody knows where, exept that it will strike Crookston. Can a railroad in one part of the county compel the other roads running in remote corners to reduce their rates? If a railroad won't pay without bonds, will it pay with them? Are some of the questions the voters should ask themselves befoere deciding the proposition of the Duluth & Dakota railroad.

Fisher Bulletin: Miss Lizzie Zarracher, our former popular teacher came over with the picnic folks yesecterday. Miss Zarracher has a host of friends....Rev Hogg, while in Fisher this week created a wonderful exitement, by stating that friend Knappen, lately of this place, was the happy father of a twelve pound son Later in the week the exitement subsided, when it was learned that the baby was a second hand affair, and one that has been adopted by Mr. and Mrs. K. But Charley'need not despair, while he keeps green the memory of biblical Sarah.

A. D. Wishard,

RED LAKE FALLS,

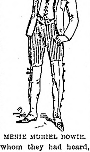
AN ADVENTUROUS GIRL TRAVELER

She Makes a Long Journey Rigged Out in Boy's Clothes.

Menie Muriel Dowie is a Scotch young lady of twenty three or four years who has a great passion for going to out of the way and unconventional places, and she prefers to go alone. Her last experience was a summer's travel and sojourn in the wildest part of eastern Europe, and she has written a very entertaining book thereon entitled "A Girl in the Carpathians." She is a granddaughter of Chambers, of encyclopedia fame, and is not only very well educated, speaking five languages fairly well, but is unusually active and vigorous.



MENIE MURIEL DOWIE.

Having made the ordinary tour of Europe she went into Russian Poland, and there her woman's dress attracted so much attention (for they were not used to seeing a woman traveling alone) that she devised a dress for herself, chiefly mannish. She wore knickerbocker pantaloons, a Tam O'Shanter, a black woolen coat, etc. So she was only recognized as a woman on close inspection, and then great was the wonder of the simple mountaineers. One village decided that she was a famous burlesque actress of whom they had heard, another that she was from some unknown land, where both sexes wore the same dress, others that she was a political refugee and still others that she was a little deranged.

A common question was: "Are you a Jewess? Are you a Christian?" When she said no to both questions the people stared and said: "How can it be? All who are not Jews are Christians." She slept in cowsheds occasionally, lounged and lingered on mountain sides all day, talked to the peasant women everywhere and made friends of the children—as a result she gathered a large store of information about the country, all of which she gives in good style. The Geographical society has complimented her work very highly, and the English critics are much pleased with it. At home Miss Dowie is a very conventional young lady, both in dress and deportment.

An Old Fashioned English Servitor.

It almost takes one back to the "good old days" of which we read so much, and which weren't such very good old days after all, to learn that after a long life of faithful service a veritable "ancient of the Middle Ages" has just gone to his grave honored and deplored by those who had noted his lifelong and humble loyalty to religion and tradition. He lived at Frampton Cotterell, England, and was known as "Old John Tovey." He died at the age of eighty-six from bronchitis, having been a parishioner of Frampton Cotterell during a good part of this century, organ blower at the parish church for many years, and a ringer in the tower since his youth or early manhood.

His last attendance at the church was on Easter day, when he was at his post as usual, and when, having expressed a desire to have a pull at the bells once more on "the queen of feasts," the other ringers tried to help him up the tower stairs, but the old man was no longer able to ascend the ninety steps. He received his Easter communion at 8 a. m. on that day. He had never learned to read or write. The procession, which preceded the corpse into the church, consisted of a cross bearer, the thurifer and attendant, the choir boys, six of whom carried each one lighted candle, the lay clerks, the verger carrying the maces, and last the rector.

Uncle Sam's New Cruiser.

The armored cruiser New York will soon be launched from the yard of the Cramps, on the Delaware, and take her place in the rapidly growing navy of the United States. She will be a monster, indeed, with a displacement of 8,150 tons, and engines having a collective capacity of 18,000 horse power—nearly 8,000 more than any vessel now in the service. There are four engines, two working the shafts on each side, and fixed to disconnect at will, so that the vessel need only run at half speed ordinarily. Her greatest speed will be twenty knots per hour.

THE NEW YORK.

The total cost, by the act authorizing the vessel, must not exceed $3,500,000. The length of the water line is 380 feet 6 inches; the molded breadth, 64 feet; the mean draught, 23¼ feet; the full complement of officers and men, 475, and her outside coal capacity is for running 13,000 miles. The cruiser will have four complete decks, and a flying deck or bridge, upon which all her boats will be carried. There will be no arrangements for carrying sail, but two military masts will be fitted with fighting tops. The New York will be arranged as a flagship.

Grievance of the Paris Waiters.

Among the queer strikes of the day place must be given to that of the waiters in Paris cafes. Their discontent has nothing to do with wages or long hours. They simply complain of not being able to wear a mustache. When a waiter has a holiday and goes to some public place of amusement, his clean shaven face betrays his occupation at once, laying him open to many sneers. Or when his turn comes for military service his comrades taunt him with the cry of "garcon" till life becomes a misery.

He Succeeds Admiral Braine.

After forty-three years' service Rear Admiral Braine was recently retired from the naval service of the United States; his last place as commandant of the navy yard at Brooklyn, has been filled by the appointment of Captain Henry Erben. Captain Erben is a native of New York, and was appointed a midshipman in 1848. He rose slowly in rank during the years of peace, and in 1862 was made lieutenant commander. Soon after the war he was promoted to be a commander. In 1879 he received the rank of captain, and is now second on the active list of that rank.

CASTLE BUILDING.

"What are you building, darling?"
I asked of my girlie fair,
As she quietly sat on the hearthrug
Piling her blocks with care,
And the ruddy glow of the firelight
Danced on her golden hair.

"I am building a castle, mother,"
My little maid replied;
"And these are the walls around it,
And here is the gateway wide,
And this is a funny stairway
To climb up by the side."

The busy, flitting fingers
Went on with their pretty play,
And the castle's walls were rising
In the fading winter day,
When a sudden, luckless motion,
And all in ruin lay!

Ah, merry little builder,
The years with stealthy feo
May bring full many a vision
Of castles rare and sweet,
To end like your baby pastime
In ruin sad and fleet.

You laugh o'er the top walls fallen;
So sunshine follows rain,
And we may smile, looking backward,
At ruined shrine and fane,
While the heart hath shattered temples
It may not build again.
—Sunshine.

SUSY KEMP'S ROMANCE.

BY C. J. V.

[Original.]

At the time our story opens, Susy Kemp was a plump little widow of about thirty five. As a girl she had been very beautiful in face and figure, very artless and romantic in her disposition, and so was very easily aptivated by a penniless adventurer and persuaded into a clandestine marriage. The marriage it is needless to say proved a very unhappy one, but Susy faithful to her marriage vows, struggled bravely to make the best of things, trying to train up her children aright and reform a drunken husband. A hopeless task she found the latter as many another has before her.

Beauty faded, health failed still she struggled on till death came to he release, taking her unworthy husband in a fit of drunkeness.

The husband was scarcely buried when her two children, a bright manly boy of ten and a lovely girl of eight, sickened and died with that dread disease, Diphtheria.

Susy stunned and bewildered was stricken with Brain Fever, and lay for many days unconscious, cared for by kind friends. By the Providence of God her life was spared and lay came slowly back to health and strength.

Life looked very dreary to poor Susy, as she faced it after having regained enough strength to think of the future. Plans were soon formed however; renting a single room taking the little furniture needed to furnish it, the rest was sold and applied to some of the numerous debts of which she found herself the possessor, for during the sickness of herself and children bills had accumulated till she found herself owing not only the doctor and undertaker, but the butcher the baker and the candle-stick maker, as well. Securing a position in a printing office as type setter, she set out bravely to earn her daily bread and pay her debts; feeling as she cheerfully said, that even that was better than to be without any object in life. By steady work and much self-denial Susy found that she could support herself comfortably and lay by a small sum every month, which was carefully and consicenciously divided among the many creditors, while much to her satisfaction she soon found the many to be growing few.

The doctor's bill was the largest and Susy found herself looking forward with much pleasure to her periodical visits to "my doctor," as she called him to herself.

Dr. Warner, the physician who had attended Susy and her children in their sickness, was a single man of about forty, very silent and reserved, very kind and courteous; a man whom every one liked as a physician yet whom few called friend.

A comparative stranger in the place, yet so singularly successful in his practice that he was as one might say, upon the topmost wave of popularity and success.

He had been much interested in Mrs. Kemp's case, a few words let fall by a neighbor awakening his interest at first, and as he watched her daily life as she came back to health, saw how patient and cheerful she was, how quiet and unassuming, yet how firm in her determination to be independent of charity, he was filled with admiration and respect.

One memorable evening as Susy called at his office she said, as she handed him a roll of money, "Dr. Warner, I think I am the happiest woman in this city to-night. I have accomplished the object which I set before me, and now so far as I know I owe no one a cent."

He smiled as he filled a receipt for the money, and said, "It is a grand thing to have carried out one's plans and to have made no failure, I heartily congratulate you," "but" he added, "do you not find your pleasure in different channels than most people; that is usually considered of so small moment, that it scarcely enters into the account of things to be thankful for, at least it appears so to me."

"Well," said Susy' "it certainly is a great thing to me and I am going to celebrate the event by taking a week's holiday." After a little more desultory conversation Susy left, and the usually busy doctor sat for an hour thinking of Susy, her words her life and her changed appearance, for in regaining health, she had also regained much of her former beauty; even youth seemed to have returned when all cause for care and anxiety were gone and no one would have taken her to be over twenty-five.

It was evident that some thought stirred the doctor to an unusual degree for at length he rose and paced the room with a very determined look upon his countenance. At lenght he said, as though speaking to some unseen remonstrant, "Yes I love her as I never thought to love any woman, and she shall be my wife if I can win her; she shall be spared all toil and care, I will make up to her what she has suffered and lost in the past, my brave darling!"

After this Susy and the doctor met much more frequently for Susy being released from the necessity of such close confining work, went more frequently into society when she invariably met the doctor; she also met him quite often at the bedside of the sick, and so the friendship grew and strengthened, but no hint did Susy receive of the determination he had arrived at as he sat in his office months before.

It happened one evening at a social gathering, where truth to tell, Dr. Warner had gone with the sole purpose in view of seeing Susy, that a young man making a very flippant and irreverant remark an the subject of religion, was sharply reproved by an elderly gentleman present, when almost unconsciously the conversation drifted into an argument pro and con. as to the Providence of God.

Dr. Warner stood by, making no comment and listening intently, when suddenly turning, the elderly gentleman alluded to, asked his opinion. "I do not believe," said he in his slow quiet way, "that there is any such thing as Providence or that there is any God in the sense that you gentlemen have intimated. What you are pleased to call Providence is merely chance and the rest is superstition." Sudden silence fell on the group at this bold avowal, when the young man who was the cause of the conversation, and who was notoriously "fast" said, "Oh come now doctor that's too bad of you, I'm not such a heathen as that my self, for I'm sure I believe there is a God, though I don't know much about His Providence."

Glancing up at this instant Dr. Warner caught Susy Kemp's gaze fastened upon him in consternation and amazement; looking him squarely in the eye she said, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God," "and you Mr. Brown" turning suddenly to that young man "Dost thou believe in God, the devils also believe and tremble," then turning to the group by whom she was surrounded resumed the interrupted conversation.

As for Dr. Warner if a bomb shell had exploded at his feet, he could have been no more astonished or confounded, and although no more was said upon the subject, the words clung to him, followed him home and came persistently to his mind on all possible occasions.

Poor Susie! alone in her room that evening she asked herself some very searching questions and made some very humiliating discoveries, a mong which these stood out boldly, that she had given her heart unsought to Dr. Warner, and that he was an infidel!

Dropping, at length, upon her knees, in the bitterness of her soul she prayed for herself that she might have strength given her for this trial, and for the doctor, that he might see the error of his way; after which she quietly retired and was soon lost in peaceful slumber.

Time passed on, Susy quietly avoided the doctor as much as possible but when this could not be done she was, seemingly, just the same quiet friend as ever, and yet the doctor acknowledged to himself there was some subtle change, an invisible barrier which he could not pass.

Meanwhile the doctor was undergoing a wonderful change which seemed transforming in its effects.

He was now to be found regularly in his pew at church; he was more interested in all that pertained to the welfare of the church, the people and the city. Instead of being the silent reserved man who could number all his friends upon the fingers of one hand, he was so kind and sympathetic is so genial and cordial, that it would have been hard indeed to have found one, old or young, who did not count themselves Dr. Warner's friend.

Susy watched these changes with wonder at first and then with inward joy, treasuring in her heart all the praises bestowed upon him and rejoicing secretly over every evidence of change going on; and when one lovely Sabbath in early Summer the doctor was received into the church after publicly professing his belief in God and all the ordinances, it seemed to her the happiest day of her life, and her heart was filled to overflowing with thankfulness to the giver of all good.

Not many days after Susy was surprised to see Dr. Warner's carriage stop before her door; as she appeared before him in answer to his knock, he said: "Good afternoon Mrs. Kemp Mr. Smith told me you were home to-day, and as I had a call into the country this afternoon I came to see if I could persuade you to accompany me, it is a lovely day for a ride."

After a moment's hesitation Susy answered, "certainly Dr. Warner I shall be very much pleased to go, and will be ready in just a few moments."

There was nothing Susy enjoyed better than a drive behind a span of handsome horses and as they fairly flew over the smooth road her glowing cheeks and sparkling eyes testified to her enjoyment of the occasion.

The farm house was soon reached where Dr. Warner's services were required; leaving Susy in the carriage he entered the house where he soon dispatched his business, and as he returned he said, "We will go back by the old mill road; it is considerably farther and a little rougher road, but the scenery repays one. I did not dare come that way for the call was very urgent, it proved though to be a very trifling sickness after all."

Thus dismissing the case from mind they turned homeward, but for some reason the gay spirits and merry conversation which they had indulged in on the outward trip seemed to have deserted them and each was silent and pre-ocupied. As they neared the vicinity of the old mill Susy said, "What a beautiful place this is, I have heard so much of the beauty of the scenery about here but was never before fortunate enough to drive this way; the beauty of the place certainly justifies all the raptures I have heard."

"Yes," said the doctor "it certainly is very lovely, but wait till we reach the brow of that hill yonder and I will show you the best view, or what I consider so. I invariably stop there when going this way and see new beauties each time."

Drawing the reins at that instant he stopped the horses. "There, said he, "just look off there to the east and see the river as it comes tumbling down that rocky gorge and then widens out and flows down the valley; the mill there at the left presents its most picturesque view from this point."

Susy turned her eyes in the direciton indicated and gazed long and earnestly at what seemed to her to be the most beautiful scene she had ever beheld. Words seemed too poor to express her feelings; at length she murmured "How grand," and turning to the doctor for sympathy she met his eyes fastened upon her in such an earnest manner that she dropped her own in confusion, while blushes mantled cheek and brow and the scenery was forgotten.

"Mrs. Kemp, Susy," said he in his musical voice, "I have loved you for two years but after the rebuke you gave me once upon a time I dared not confess it to you, but I want to tell you Susy dear, that that rebuke administered so bravely by you has brought me only blessing; now that the barrier is removed may I not hope for your love, "Oh Susy darling" he said as he took her unresisting hand, "do you not love me, will you not be my wife."

"Yes," murmured Susy, and as she raised her eyes to the face he read there a fuller answer than the little monosylable would give. A happy looking couple they were as they drove home that afternoon and a happy looking couple they were, as every one remarked, as three months later they stood before the gray haired minister in the church and were made one in the bonds of matrimony.

A happier woman than Susy can not be found in all the land, and she laughingly declares that she has had a real romance and though begun so sadly it has taken a happy turn and is still going on, growing more and more lovely day by day. It is also evident from the smiling countenance of Dr. Warner that he fully agrees with her, as I am sure you my dear reader will also do.

Those Terrible Wires.

It is a certain thing that all electric wires will have to go under ground, and the quicker the work is performed the better for the people of St. Louis. It is a dangerous piece of business to pick up the ear trumpet of a telephone carelessly, for a finger may come in contact with the brass end, which would be followed by the death of the careless individual if the phone wires were crossed by any of the electric wires. Take a small compass and watch how easily it can be upset by simply bringing the ear trumpet of this phone within a foot of it. This ought not to be the case, and it plainly shows that the wires are highly charged with electricity, which accounts for the loud buzzing sound heard when a person endeavors to use the telephone. If an exposed electric wire should come in contact with a piece of metal on a roof, the result would be a conflagration which could not be put out, as it is useless to throw water on an electric wire with the idea of stopping the flames which ensue, as water would make a non-conductor a conductor, and the fire would rapidly spread. The damage to the various buildings, telephones and switch-boards inflicted during the past week was only the work of the wires of half of the companies which have contracts to illuminate the city, and what the result will be when all the lights are ready to be lit nobody can foreshadow.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Long Horns in Germany,

The American cattle recently shipped to Germany seem to be resenting any undue familiarity on the part of the good natured Teutons. An amusing statement comes from Mr. Smith, United States commercial agent at Mayence, Germany: "Meat is high in price, and German butchers have been importing live cattle from America. But the importers have been greatly astonished by the wild and ferocious aspect of the American steers, as compared with that of their own milder tempered cattle, and it is feared that the sale of the oxen from the New World will be injured thereby."

A MILLION A YEAR.

Lottery and Prize Schemes Used to Sell Alum and Ammonia Baking Powders.

A New York concern, manufacturers of an ammonia baking powder boasts that its yearly profits are over a million dollars. While perhaps, none of the makers of alum powders individually can show so large earnings yet their profits are enormous.

A business so profitable, will always attract to itself those whose greed will cause them to utterly disregard the effect their traffic may have upon the health or life of others.

Alum baking powders are introduced largely by gifts, prizes and lottery schemes. A piece of glassware or china, a child's wagon, sled a pewter spoon or some other article of attractive appearance, but of small intrinsic value or cost is given with each purchase or a number is attached to the can which entitles the customer to a similarly numbered article or to a prize of some kind. It is in some such way as this that the trade in alum and ammonia baking powders, which has now attained such giant proportions and their consumption by the public which has reached an extent which is truly alarming.

The highest authorities of all countries condemn the use of alum in bread without reserve. In America the most distinguished physicians, chemists and hygienists have declared that the traffic in alum baking powders should be suppressed by law. In England and France where the subject of pure food, and its effects upon the system, has been more fully considered and made the subject of extended experiments by the scientists, so serious a matter is the use of alum in bread or other food considered to be, that most stringent laws have been enacted to prevent it. These laws are rigidly enforced, and the sale ot alum baking powders would not be permitted for an hour. Any one who attempted to make them for use in food, or attempt- to use them for raising bread, biscuit or cake would suffer severe penalties.

The ill effect upon the system of food raised by alum baking powders are the more dangerous because of their insidious character. It would be less dangerous to the community were it fatal at once, for then such food would be avoided; but their deleterious action because imperceptible at first is no less certain.

The puckering effect which alum has when taken in the mouth is familiar to everyone. Physicians say this same effect is produced by it upon the delicate coats of the stomach and intestines.

What housewife would take home to her family a can of alum or ammonia baking powder if she knew it. Such powders not only undermine the system, but it is pointed out that ammonia taken into the system in even infinetisimal doses day after day, imparts to the complexion a sallow and blotched appearance.

It is safe to discard all baking powders sold with a prize or gift.

What a misnomer are the words Absolutely Pure," as applied to baking powders two of the largest selling brands, one made from alum, the other containing ammonia and both of these drugged baking powders have stamped upon their labels and circulars these words absolutely pure, as a matter of fact they are "Absolutely Poor," as shown by official examinations.

HARD ON THE DOG.

The Latest Ingenious Method of Deceiving Customs Officials.

"Talking about smuggling reminds me of a trick I saw resorted to by a passenger on one of the big Cunarders a couple of years ago," said a loquacious commercial traveler. "You know there is a duty on diamonds, and one of the passengers had three large stones, worth several thousand dollars, which he had purchased in London. The problem of how to evade paying duty on the stones worried him considerably, but at last he evolved a plan, and a few days before the steamer arrived in New York he proceed to execute it.

"The chief officer had a little skye terrier, and the passenger, after considerable coaxing induced him to sell the dog. As soon as the smuggler gained possession of the animal he tied him up and gave him nothing to eat until just before we were to go ashore. He then procured some fat meat from the cook, and cutting off a piece a little larger than a walnut made a hole in it into which he placed one of the diamonds.

"A dog will generally bolt a piece of fat without chewing it, and, of course, a diamond will go down with it. The hungry dog swallowed the meat, as his owner expected he would, and in a short time the three diamonds were safely stowed away in his interior. The diamond smuggler had no difficulty in evading the vigilance of the custom house officials, and was soon on his way up town, leading the dog by a string.

"I met him again a few days afterward, and asked him how he recovered the stones. 'Easy enough,' he replied. 'As soon as I got home I shot the dog and found the diamonds after a short search. Of course I was sorry for the dog, but dogs are cheap and the tariff on stones is high, and I never allow sympathy to interfere with business."—Jeweler's Weekly.

Useful Missionaries,

The time was when a knowledge of the gospel and a zeal for saving souls was the only qualifications considered necessary in a missionary.

Now it is found that his usefulness as a civilizing medium depends quite as much on his knowledge of some of the common practiced arts, such as farming, carpentry, cooking, tailoring, iron working and instrumental music.

There is an institution in Brooklyn where missionaries are trained, and where the subject mentioned are parts of the regular curriculum.

PETTICOAT RULE INDEED,

The Women of Alaska Run Things Pretty Much as They Please.

The Alaskan man, according to Kate Field's Washington, never dares make a bargain without his wife's consent, because she is the better trader.

So clever are the women in preparing the fish and berries for the winter, collecting the roots, plaiting the mats and baskets out of rushes, and weaving the precious Chilkat blanket, that they are valuable members of society, their judgment and opinions are respected, and their advice is followed.

It is the husband who collects the wood and makes the fire, cleans the fish, and constructs the wooden utensils for the household.

When the Thlinket woman has company drop in unexpectedly to dinner, or makes a feast to pay off her social indebtedness, is it she who stands heated and tired over the great fire where the huge joints are roasting? Not at all. The husband cooks and serves the meats.

When a young and handsome woman adds to her value by presenting her husband with sons and daughters, does she renounce her active outdoor life, excitement of the fishing, the staining and weaving of her mats and baskets, or leaves the gathering of the winter's rations to the husband, while she devotes her valuable skill to crooning lullabies and walking the house with teething and screaming babies? Not in the least? Her baby is not the spoiled tyrant of pampered civilization. He is bound into his cradle and kept there until he can walk. His mother takes him out about once a week for a bath, puts him back in his cradle, hangs him up on a tree, perches him on a wall, or lays him down in some out of the way corner wherever it is most convenient, and serenely pursues the even tenor of her way as if he did not exist, exactly as his father does. Howling does not change a baby's condition, as he presently discovers, and so there is little crying, and, in consequence, babies are not such nuisances as they are when permitted to have wills of their own before possessing brains enough to guide those wills discreetly.

The pride of the Thlinket housewife is in her mats of black, red, yellow and blue, dyed and woven precisely as her great-grandmother fashioned mats before her. She weaves squatting upon the ground, but she sews lying flat upon her stomach and leaning upon her elbows. Doubtless there are few round-shouldered women among them, but how they manage to work under such apparently adverse circumstances is difficult to understand.

Their finest art in weaving is the Chilkat blanket made by each woman, assisted by her children if she has any, of the wool of the mountain sheep, in highly decorative art and worn on ceremonial occasions only. A woman working alone occupies two months in making one of these blankets, and works from eight to ten hours a day. The weaving and plaiting is never commenced until the severity of the weather drives the women indoors.

A little incident illustrative of the absolute authority of these women is told by a captain who witnessed it at Cape Cross. One of the chiefs accidentally prevented a woman in her canoe from approaching the ship, whereupon she seized a paddle and struck him on the head so violently as almost to disable him from defending himself from the blows which followed. This unequal combat continued half an hour, in spite of the captain's firing a gun over their heads to frighten them, and finally this sweet child of nature stepped into the man's canoe, whipped a knife from her dress, and cut her victim once across the thigh, being prevented from continuing her little pleasantry only by the forcible interference of the captain's men. During the whole engagement not a man among the natives dared interfere. It would be an interesting discussion for the women's clubs—the reason of such a state of submission to feminine control, which is said to depend not upon the virtues of the husbands, but because of the utility of the women, who in all the industries of the nation are equally skillful with the men.

Taking Fish by Electricity.

"There is no longer any need of the fairy tales told by amateur fishermen" said an electrical expert last night.

"Wizard Edison has turned out a fish hook, or rather a hook for all sorts of fish, from the cod down to the minnow, that will stun the fish the moment it touches the hook. If a man gets a bite at all he is sure of his fish.

"The trouble with the amateur fisherman is that he cannot land his capture, but with this new electrical device he will have no trouble in catching all the fish he wants if they are biting."—New York Telegram.

Awkward Enough.

Brobson—You look all broken up, old man. What's the matter?

Craik—I called on Miss Pruyn the other night, and no sooner had I entered the parlor than her mother appeared and demanded to know my intentions.

Brobson — That must have been rather embarrassing.

Craik—Yes, but that was not the worst. Just as the old lady finished speaking Miss Pruyn shouted down the stairs: "Mamma, mamma, he isn't the one!"—New York Sun.

Not a Success.

A man in Iowa invented a safety brake to stop a runaway horse. He tried it on his peaceful animal and scared it so it ran away, threw the inventor out, smashed the buggy into kindling wood, and hasn't been seen since. He says now he will give the invention to any man who will return his horse.

Summary Execution.

A despotic government has its advantages, and among them is the easy collection of a debt, provided the ruler is friendly to the creditor. Ahmed Vefyk Pasha, a Turkish statesman, was once Governor of Broussa, and this story is told of his paternal rule:

A rich man had judgment pronounced against him in favor of a poor man. The latter, owing to the bribes of the rich man, could not obtain execution, and complained to Ahmed Vefyk. After hearing the case, Ahmed saw the debtor riding up to the Konak upon a beautiful Arab horse. He ordered the creditor to sit down, called a messenger, and whispered to him.

The debtor entered the room, and was surprised at the exceptional cordiality of the pasha, who invited him to sit down, to take coffee, and to converse. Presently, when he rose to leave, the pasha pressed him to remain, and kept him more than an hour, until, indeed, a messenger entered the room and placed a small bag on the table before Ahmed.

When the debtor next rose, Ahmed took the bag from the table and gave it to him, stating, "This is yours. You owed so much to this poor man, I have sold your horse, paid him, and this is the balance belonging to you."

A Place To Grow Up.

Some years ago, Horace Greeley's advice to "Go West, and grow up with the country," was thought not only a smart saying, but good counsel. It is no doubt such still, but its age counts against it some, besides which, there is no longer any unsettled West. The West is new, to be sure, but it has more thriving cities with water-works, electric street cars, eight-story buildings, and town-lot boomers, to the acre, than any other part of the country. For the man who has his fortune to make, the "New South," or the great State of Texas, offer opportunities not to be surpassed. In development they are really newer country than the Northwest or the Pacific coast. To all points in the South. "The Burlington," with its own tracks to St. Louis and Kansas City, is the route beyond all others for the young or old man who is looking southward for a home. DID THE HUSBAND REFORM?

Method of a Wife to Destroy the Liquor and Tobacco Habits.

That women of refinement do not wage war against liquor and tobacco as a mere matter of taste, to say nothing of moral aspect of the habits, is simply another proof of the marvelous patience of the gentler sex, says the Chicago Herald. "I like the scent of a good cigar," said a young married woman at an informal gathering the other day. "Do you?" retorted a wife of twenty years. "Well, I don't believe it. The fresh smoke of a cigar is not particularly unpleasant, but I can't understand how any healthy person can enter a room in which tobacco smoke has grown stale and escape a nausea, and the breath of a smoker is something to which I simply cannot become accustomed. Some years ago my husband complimented me upon the tolerance for tobacco which I had acquired. I told him it wasn't tolerance, but merely that sort of martyrdom which accepts the inevitable in silence. That made him angry, and we had a few words which are seldom seen in romantic novels. That night just before his time to return from the office I ate a good, large, strong onion. When he came I smiled, put my arms around his neck, kissed him and asked his forgiveness for my previous impatience. I noticed on his face a struggle between a look of disapprobation and one of kindness, but he is a generous man, and he kissed me and didn't say anything about the onion. The next afternoon I boiled cabbage and purposely left the doors open between the kitchen and the sitting room. When he came in the air was dense with the odor. I had on my prettiest dress, and welcomed him with a true honeymoon tenderness, but the cabbage was too much for his patience, and he crossly inquired whether I hadn't better move the kitchen range in the parlor and do my cooking there. However, I was all patience and sweetness, and shifted responsibility for the vegetable atmosphere upon the carelessness of the cook. The day after this my husband sent home a mess of frogs' legs, a dish of which he is especially fond. I saw that the cook prepared them exactly to his liking, and when he entered the dining room they were on a big dish near his plate, crisp and brown and garnished with water cresses. But he didn't eat any of the frogs' legs. Why? Well, at great inconvenience I had secured from the grocer a packet of German cheese which was so renlolent that one could almost see the odor. That cheese reposed in a pretty glass dish in the center of the table. The poor man got as far as "What in the name of ——," when I burst out laughing. When I was able to control myself I explained to him. "I've just been trying to give you a little object lesson," I said, "in the punishment a woman has to endure with a husband who uses liquor and tobacco. At present I am not very fond of onions, cabbage or Limburger cheese, but the habits of men teach me that one can acquire a taste for anything that is naturally objectional if time and patience are devoted to the task. I hope that you'll get used to it, dear, and that in a month or two we may enjoy our tobacco and beer and onions and cheese together, and create a home atmosphere which will be the envy of all the neighbors." "I suppose he gave up liquor and tobacco then," said the young woman, cheerfully.

The married woman of twenty years did not answer directly. "After you have been married ten years," she said, "you try to break your husband of something. However, nothing so irretrievably destroys the romance with which every bride regards the man of her choice as the recognition of the fact that he is the slave of habits which render his presence unpleasant in the extreme. Such a man wouldn't think it strange if his wife would object to his constant appearance in dirt and rags, and yet in the matter of household happiness and content the sense of smell is about as important a factor to a woman as that of sight.

Strength of Men and Women.

A French scientist who experimented with fifty persons of both sexes, using a machine, for compression as a test of strength, found that the strongest man was able to produce with his right hand a pressure equivalent to 85 kilograms (a kilogram is rather more than two pounds) and the weakest to 40 kilograms, the average being 56 kilograms. One curious result was arrived at; the short men were all very nearly as strong as the tall men, the average difference between equal groups of two sizes being only three kilograms. The force of the strongest women of the fifty who were selected amounted to only 44 kilograms, and that of the weakest to 16 kilograms, while the average was 33 kilograms.

We Have Syrians Also.

It is not generally known that there is a colony of Syrians in Macon, Ga., yet such is the fact. They are small tradesmen, dealers in fruit, etc. For some time they congregated at a little fruit stall on Fourth street, near Cherry, but are now scattered in various places around the city. When at home they wear the fez and some other parts of oriental costume, but when at business they don ordinary clothing and appear as American citizens.

Prevention of Imprudent Borrowing.

The Egyptians had a very remarkable ordinance to prevent persons from borrowing imprudently. An Egyptian was not permitted to borrow without giving to his creditor in pledge the body of his father. It was deemed both an impiety and an imfamy not to redeem so sacred a pledge. A person who died without discharging that duty was deprived of the customary honors paid to the dead.

Insane Hebrews.

Insanity among Hebrews is increasing. In the lunatic asylums of Prussia the number of Hebrews is said to have nearly quadrupled in sixteen years. According to the statistics of the German Empire there are 389 insane Hebrews in every 100,000 of their number against 241 insane protestants and 237 insane Roman catholics in every 100,000.

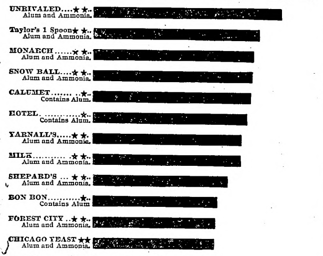
Testing the Baking Powders.

Comparative Worth Illustrated,

BY PROF. PETER COLLIER, LATE CHEMIST IN CHIEF OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, WASHINGTON, D. C.



Above diagram was drawn and verified in all its details, by Prof. Peter Collier, who is pre-eminent as a Chemist, and Scientist. The illustration is made in accordance with his chemical tests of each brand enumerated.

The Carbonic acid gas was calculated to get the leavening strength and the quantative analysis to ascertain the comparative wholesomeness, purity, and general usefulness of the leading Powders. The result of Prof. Collier's examination and test, reveals the fact, that, with but one exception, every brand tested contained either Ammonia or Alum, and a number both.

Not one woman in ten thousand would use an Ammonia or Alum Baking Powder if she knew it. Such Powders not only undermine the health, but ammonia imparts a sallow or blotched complexion.

NOTE.—Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, as shown by Prof. Collier's examinations, is the only pure Cream Tartar Powder found free from adulteration and the highest in strength. All authorities report Dr. Price's free from Ammonia, Alum, Lime, or any other adulterant. The purity of this ideal Powder has never been questioned.

★ Indicates the Powder containing either Ammonia or Alum.

★★ Indicates the Powder containing both Ammonia and Alum.

While the diagram shows some of these Ammonia or Alum Powders to be of higher strength than others classed below them, it must not be taken that they possess any value. All Ammonia or Alum powders should be avoided as dangerous, no matter how high their strength.

The Autocrat's Thoughts on Old Age.

I am afraid, says Oliver Wendell Holmes in the January Atlantic, that old people found life rather a dull business in the time of King David and his rich old subject and friend, Barzillai, who, poor man, could not have told a teal from a canvas-back, nor enjoyed a symphony concert, if they had those luxuries in his day. There were no pleasant firesides, for there were no chimneys. There were no daily newspapers for the old man to read, and he could not read if there were, with his dim eyes, nor hear them read, very probably, with his dulled ears. There was no tobacco, a soothing drug, which in its various forms is a great solace to many old men and to some women—Carlyle and his mother used to smoke their pipes together, you remember.

Old age is infinitely more cheerful, for intelligent people at least, than it was two or three thousand years ago. It is our duty, so far as we can, to keep it so. There will always be enough about it that is solemn, and more than enough, alas! that is saddening. But how much there is in our time to lighten its burdens! If they that look out at the windows be darkened, the optician is glad to supply them with eye-glasses for use before the public, and spectacles for their hours of privacy. If the grinders cease because they are few, they can be made many again by a third dentition, which brings no toothache in its train. By temperence and good habits of life, proper clothing, well-warmed, well-drained, and well-ventilated dwellings, and sufficient, not too much exercise, the old man of our time may keep his muscular strength in very good condition. I doubt if Mr. Gladstone, who is fast nearing his 80th birthday would boast, in the style of Caleb, that he was as good a man with his ax as he was when he was 40, but I would back him—if the match were possible—for a 100 shekels, against the overconfident old Israelite, to cut down and chop up a cedar of Lebanon. I know a most excellent clergyman, not far from my own time of life, whom I would pit against any old Hebrew rabbi, or Greek philosopher of his years and weight, if they could return to flesh, to run a quarter of a mile on a good, level track.

We must not make too much of such exceptional cases of prolonged activity. I often reproached my dear friend and classmate, James Freeman Clarke that his ceaseless labors made it impossible for his coevals to enjoy the luxury of that repose which their years demanded. A wise old man, the late Dr. James Walker, president of harvard university, said that the great privilege of old age was the getting rid of responsibilities. Those hard-working veterans will not let one get rid of them until he drops in his harness, and so gets rid of them and his life together. How often has many a tired old man envied the superannuated family cat, stretched upon the rug before the fire letting the genial warmth tranquilly diffuse itself through all her internal arrangements! No more watching for mice in dark, damp cellars, no more awaiting the savage gray rat at the mouth of his den, no more scurrying up trees and lampposts to avoid the neighbor's cur who wishes to make her acquaintance! It is very grand to "die in harness," but it is very pleasant to have the tight-straps unbuckled and the heavy collar lifted from the neck and shoulders.

◆

Our Ancestor's Fashions.

The origin and caprices of fashion would, if properly written, make one of the most entertaining books of the season. No one but a philosopher, however, should undertake such an enterprise, and all those who think that stories about our ancestors are necessarily dull reading should not be invited to the feast. The fashions of 1890 may challenge all degrees of criticism, but we shall find by investigation that they were surpassed by oddities in the former centuries, and that many of our current novelties are only coppied in a tame way of what has gone before. In the time of Charles II. French fashions swept England like a cyclone. The puritans were shocked, and affected all possible simplicity and sanctity. When courtiers adopted hats with head plumes "they clapped on round black caps and screwed up their religious faces;" and, when shoe-buckles were revived they wore strings. When wigs and snuff-boxes came into fashionable use it is said that Steele's large black periwig cost him no less than 40 guineas! Such a wig was the idol of fashion. At the same time there was nothing so monstrous as the head-dresses of the ladies. They formed a kind of edifice on the head three stories high, and the industry connected with the manufacture of wigs and the dressing of hair supported nearly half the working population of the realm.

A Contest of Colors.

Up in the red man's country, in which representatives of nearly all races appear to have congregated, there was a fistic contest between Messrs. Blue and White, and strangely enough they were both black. The black men were arrested by a red man and tried before a white man. It was not a war of races or of color.—Galveston News.

"What's that? A new invention which works all the year round? Surprisin'—these days are not like the old times. Bleedin' was the only remedy them days. But now, as you say, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a true remedy for the blood."

It's not like the sarsaparillas, that are said to be good for the blood in March, April and May. The "Golden Medical Discovery" works equally well at all times, in all seasons and in all cases of blood-taints, or humors, no matter what their name or nature.

"Golden Medical Discovery" is the only Blood and Liver medicine, sold by druggists, guaranteed to benefit or cure in every case, on fair trial, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded. World's Dispensary Medical Association, Proprietors, No. 663 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

Don't Be Bulldozed

By a rebellious liver. Though it may refuse to be brought into subjection by ordinary cathartics and cholagogues, though it may continue to destroy your peace with its manifold unpleasant symptoms, be assured that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will effectually discipline it, promptly rectify its irregularities. Malaria, constipation, dyspepsia, rheumatism and kidney complaints are also remedied by the Bitters.

SYRUP of FIGS

ONE ENJOYS

Both the method and results when Syrup of Figs is taken; it is pleasant and refreshing to the taste, and acts gently yet promptly on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels, cleanses the system effectually, dispels colds, headaches and fevers and cures habitual constipation. Syrup of Figs is the only remedy of its kind ever produced, pleasing to the taste and acceptable to the stomach, prompt in its action and truly beneficial in its effects, prepared only from the most healthy and agreeable substances, its many excellent qualities commend it to all and have made it the most popular remedy known.

Syrup of Figs is for sale in 50c and $1 bottles by all leading druggists. Any reliable druggist who may not have it on hand will procure it promptly for any one who wishes to try it. Do not accept any substitute.

Truth.—One of the sublimest things in the world is plain truth.

It will be remembered that Mrs. P. H. Gribbins who was here recently visiting her sister, Mrs. Thomas Rafferty, was almost blind from some disease of the eyes. After returning to her home at 1211 First Avenue, North Minneapolis, she was unable to go out without someone to lead her, notwithstanding she had been doctoring constantly for six months. About three weeks ago Mr. Rafferty was in Minneapolis and advised her to consult Dr. Frank Powell, (White Beaver) of St. Paul, which she did and in this short time the doctor has produced almost a complete cure.—Lanesboro Minn. Journal, July 31, 1891.

For stomach chills from improper eating or drinking take Johnson's Anodyne Linament.

Minnie L. Armstrong, a lady well known in the newspaper field has produced a work on "The Modern Evil" which is liable to cause a greater furore than the Kruetzer Sonata or any other work of a like nature. The author endeavors to show the evils of the modern system of social relations between the sexes and advocates an universal law of divorce and a free and easy divorce at that. She does not think it necessary in order to find perfect happiness in this world, that two loving hearts must appear before a skirted minister or drunken justice to bind them together till death doth them part, but rather that the love which exists between them is a tie strong enough to bind, whatever trials or tribulations may beset them and when that love has lost its power to bind it is better for the unhappy couple to part and be separated.

The author makes her hero utter some very startling truths as for example "can you tell me what difference there is for a woman to sell herself to a man for the clothes she may wear, or the food she may eat, with or without the marriage ceremony? I verily believe that in the eyes of heaven the one who has perjured her soul by standing before the altar and taken upon herself those sacred vows before God, commits the greater sin."

Whilst the usages and traditions of society as it is may not agree with this and other sentiments of a like character still within the thinkers mind there must be a doubt as to whether with all our boasted civilization our social laws tend to increase the happiness of the great majority. It is a difficult question to solve and "The Modern Evil" will in some measure tend to enlighten the masses by calling attention to the fallacies and corruptness of our present laws. We predict a great sale for the book.

99 per cent. of those investing in Real Estate make money, 87 per cent. of those investing in Business lose money.

A commercial center is the safest place to invest in real estate, especially when such place is a great railway center; has good river transportation and large foreign and domestic shipping. Portland is that place.

Portland, Oregon, is now pre-eminently the commercial center of the Pacific Northwest. No other city in the United States is so well situated in respect to natural resources as is Portland, and it leads all other cities west of the Mississippi River in its phenomenal growth in population. Located at the confluence of two great rivers, and being the terminus of more transcontinental railways than any other city in the United States. In fact, every advantage which insures the solid growth and prosperity of a city is abundantly enjoyed by Portland.

WE are making a specialty this season of what we call our PARAGON HARNESS. Made of the FINEST STOCK and the very BEST WORKMANSHIP. Such a harness cannot be bought for less than $25. at retail. But we are willing, in order to introduce it, to SELL ONE SET ONLY to one person as a sample for $16.50.

$25.00 HARNESS FOR $16.50

IN GENUINE RUBBER $18.50.

DESCRIPTION OF HARNESS.

A fine Buggy Harness stitched twelve stitches to the inch, except traces which are stitched ten. Is made to represent a $50 harness. It has a 3 or 3 1-2 hand laced, leather pad saddle, with covered seat and jockeys; is made from fine stock. Bridle is of usual dimensions, has fine blinds, nice leather front and beautiful rosettes with glass centers, nice nickel bit. Check-rein, either overdraw with nose piece, or side check. Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strap, breeching and side folds are made either of patent enamel or plain harness leather as preferred and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased, give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Boxloops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C,.. St. P.,M. & O.Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St.Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7;45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

A Special Election

On the Bond Question, Tuesday, August 25th, 1891—The Agreement and Proposition—Don't Fail to Vote Against This Nafarious Scheme.

Notice is hereby given that whereas the Duluth and Dakota railway company have filed in the office of the county auditor of Polk county, Minnesota, a proposition in writing, as follows, viz:

PROPOSITION.

To all whom it may concern:

Take notice that the Duluth and Dakota railway company, a corporation duly formed, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Minnesota, hereby makes application to the county of Polk, in said state, for aid in the construction of that portion of its line of railroad extending from a point within the city of Crookston, in said county of Polk, to its point of intersection with the line of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad in the county of Itasca, in said state; and to that end the Duluth & Dakota railway company make the following proposition:

1. Said county of Polk shall make and issue negotiable coupon bonds thereof to the amount of two hundred and twenty thousand dollars, in the denomination of one thousand dollars each, all to bear date the first day of January, A. D. 1892, and be payable to the Duluth & Dakota railway company or bearer twenty years after date thereof, and not before maturity thereof at the option of said county and to bear interest from date thereof, payable semi-annually, on the first days of January and July in each year, and at the rate of five per cent per year.

2. Said Duluth and Dakota railway company, in consideration of such aid and bonds, shall and will, at the election of said county of Polk, issue thereto such number of the shares of its capital stock as will, at the par value of such stock, correspond with the principal sum of such bonds.

3. All said bonds shall be deposited in escrow prior to any delivery thereof to said Duluth & Dakota railway company; and such deposit shall be made with the First National Bank of Crookston, a corporation duly formed, organized and existing under and by virtue of the national banking act of the United States of America and having its principal place of business, office and residence at the city of Crookston, county of Polk and state of Minnesota; and all the stock certificates for said shares of stock shall likewise be deposited and placed with the same depository and at the same time with said bonds and stock certificates shall be and remain in the possession and custody of the said First National bank of Crookston, until all said portion of the line of the line of railroad of the said Duluth & Dakota railway company, extending from a point within the said city of Crookston to the point of intersection or junction thereof with the said Duluth and Winnipeg railroad, in the said county of Itasca, shall have been located, constructed and completed according to the ordinary standard gauge and in actual operation, with cars running thereon.

4. The said Duluth & Dakota railway company in consideration of said aid and bonds, shall and will, prior to the first day of December, A. D. 1892, well and truly locate, construct and complete, according to the ordinary standard gauge and put in actual operation with cars running thereon all that portion of its said line of railroad extending from a point within said city of Crookston to the point of intersection or junction thereof with the Duluth and Winnipeg railroad in said county of Itasca.

5. Within thirty days from and after (and under no circumstances until after) completion and actual operation as aforesaid by the said Duluth and Dakota railway company of all said portion of its said line of railroad, the said First National bank of Crookston shall deliver all said stock certificates to said county of Polk and all said bonds to the said Duluth and Dakota railway company upon production of the certificate in writing of the railway commissioners of the state of Minnesota, or one of them, to the effect that, upon examination and inspection actually made and had, the said portion of said line of railroad has been duly and properly constructed, completed and put in operation as aforesaid.

6. It is mutually understood that the construction, maintainance and operation of said portion of the line of railroad of the said Duluth & Dakota railway will furnish to the farmers, merchants, and other inhabitants of said county of Polk a competing line of railway transportation from the several stations thereof in said county to the head of Lake Superior; and that such competing line will be shorter than any now existing line or lines of transportation between said county and the head of Lake Superior by an estimated distance of not less than fifty miles; and in order to permanently secure and insure to all the inhabitants of said county the advantages now contemplated and which ought to accrue to them from the construction, maintainance and operation of said competing line, the said Duluth and Dakota railway company, in consideration of said aid and bonds, hereby guarantees, on behalf of its successors and assigns to said county and to each and all the inhabitants thereof, that the rate for transportation of any grain, merchandise or other commodity to any station on the line of the said Duluth & Dakota railway within said county of Polk from the head of Lake Superior or from any such station to the head of Lake Superior shall never exceed the rate per bushel or per ton per mile now being charged by any or either of the now existing line or lines of railway extending between any station in said county and the head of said Lake Superior.

In testimony whereof the said Duluth and Dakota railway company has caused this instrument to be signed by its president and secretary and to be duly sealed with its corporate seal.

Dated July 14, A. D. 1891.

DULUTH & DAKOTA RAILWAY COMPANY.

{ CORPORATE SEAL. } By R. W. Cameron, Pres.
By Charles Kydd, Sec.

Now therefore notice is hereby given, that a special election will be held and had in and for the purpose of voting upon the said proposition on

Twenty-fifth Day of August, A. D. 1891,

and that the polls will be open in the various towns, wards and precincts, from nine o'clock in the forenoon until five o'clock in the afternoon of said day.

Given under my hand and seal this 5th day of August, 1891.

(OFFICIAL SEAL.) C. U. WEBSTER,
County Auditor Polk County, Minn.

AGREEMENT.

In addition to the above proposition the following contract has been entered into between the Duluth and Dakota Railway Company and the County of Polk:

THIS AGREEMENT, Made and entered into this 21 day of July, A.D. 1891, by and between the Board of county Commissioners of Polk County in the state of Minnesota, party of the first part, and the Duluth and Dakota Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the law of the State of Minnesota, party of the second part; WITNESSETH:—

WHEREAS, in order to secure said bonds, said party of the second part is desirous of entering into an agreement with the said party of the first part, in behalf of the people of said Polk County whereby the rate on wheat shipped from any point in the County of Polk, on the line of railway of said party or the second part to the head of Lake Superior, shell not exceed the rate of twelve and one half (12½) cents per hundred (100) pounds from said point of shipment to said destination.

NOW THEREFORE, said party of the second party hereby agees that it will at times and seasons carry or procure to be carried, all wheat delivered to it at stations along the line of its railway in said Polk county at a rate not to exceed twelve and one half (12½) cents per hundred (100) pound for the carrying of said wheat to the head of Lake Superior; provided, however, that said Polk County shell vote favorably upon the proposition of said party of the second part for bonds to aid in the building of its said railway, and that said bondf to the amount, not to "exceed two hundred and twenty thousand ($220,000,000) dollars, shall be voted and delivered to said railway company when its line of railway shall be completed from a connection with the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad in Itasca County Minnesota, to a point in the city of Crookston, in said Polk County and State of Minnesota.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties hereto have caused these presents to be signed and sealed as respective officers and seals, the day and year first above written.

State Teacher's Institute.

An institution for the County of Polk will be held at Crookston Minnesota, during the week commencing Monday, August 24th, 1891.

The state will provide efficient instructors, who will be furnished with such professional books, apparatus and material as have been thoroughly tested and found to be of special service to teachers. Great pains will be taken to make the instruction pointed and in the degree practical, in matters pretaining to the management and grading of schools and the teaching of common school branches.

One evening will be devoted to a lecture by some good speaker.

The conductor and superintendent may also arrange for another entertainment.

Teachers are requested to note that this fall and next spring some of the examination questions in "Theory and practice" sent out by this department will be based on Page's Theory and Practice; and the instructors will make free use of the same work. Every teacher should procure a copy for use in the institute and for subsequent study.

Teachers who take proper interest in their calling, and who desire by self-improvement to advance to higher positions, will be present at the opening Monday afternoon and remain till Friday evening. At the close of the week, certificates signed by the State Superintendent, county superintendent and conductor, will be issued to all who have been neither tardy nor absent at any session, and who have been diligent and shown progress in the work of the institute.

All schools can be legally closed during institute week at the request of the teachers or the county superintendent.

The institute will be in charge of the superintendent, who will make all required arrangements for its success, as well as for the accommodation of teachears, who are requested to give him early notice of their intention to be present, that he may provide board for all at the lowest rates.

Good Looks.

Good looks are more than skin deep, depending upon a healthy condition of all the vital organs. If the Liver be inactive, you have a Bilious Look, if your stomache be disordered you have a Dyspeptic Look and if your Kidney be affected you have a Pinched Look. Secure good health and you will have good looks. Electric bitters is the great alterative and Tonic acts directly on the vital organs. Cures Pimples, Blotches, Boils and gives a good complexion. Sold at W. A. Schreiters Drug store, 50c. per bottle.

Guaranteed Cure or La Grippe

We authorize our advertised druggist to sell you Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds, upon this condition. If you are afflicted with La Grippe and will use this remedy according to directions, giving it a fair trial, and experience no benefit, you may return the bottle and have your money refunded. We make the offer, because of the wonderful success of Dr. King's New Discovery during last season's epidemic. Have heard of no case in which it failed Try. Trial bottle free at W. A. Schreiters Drug store. Large size 50c. $1.00.

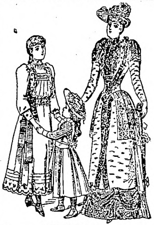
The Bonding Question.

Following is from the Thirten Towns: If the Duluth and Dakota Railroad Company intend to build their line through eastern Polk County, why don't they say so in their proposition? Vote against the steal.—It is well for all, occasionally at least to recall Lord Nelson's last words: "Thank God I have done my duty." Every voter in this land has a duty to perform. Too many ballots are dropped into the box by men who are not acquainted with God and duty. Bear this in mind on August 25th and turn out and vote against the bonds.

The Fashions of Paris.

The French modes now for young children in both home and outdoor toilets are for greater simplicity in form and garniture. Growing girls wear plain but girlish gowns of soft India silk, either plain or figured, challie or mousseline de laine. The illustration will show how they are made. The original of this model is brick dust red, with white embroidery and a sash with three deep loops of ribbon three shades darker, or bien of black velvet ribbon.

The little girl in the picture wears a quaint little gown of grass green and black hair line stripe silk, trimmed with brelettes of white ribbon, which also forms a flot in front and ends in rosettes behind. We call this a harness of ribbon, and it is made separate from the dress, therefore it can be worn with any other costume where the colors harmonize. The hat for the large girl is of rice straw with a wreath of bluets and wheat ears. The little one wears a Milan braid with a wreath of small pink roses. Muslin hats shirred with no trimming except perhaps one blood red rose upon it, or a small bouquet of Marguerites loosely fastened and without foliage.



A TYPICAL GROUP.

The toilet of the mother is of India silk in vieux rose, trimmed with Spanish lace and velvet ribbon. The flounce and the festoon only extend across the foot of the front breadth and the back is laid fan shape. The front of the basque is trimmed in a novel and effective style. The hat is of Milan braid, trimmed with pink roses and black lace and one small cream colored plume. The parasol is of old rose silk covered with narrow ruffles of black point d'esprit lace.

A Disastrous Fire.

The fire in the Leiter house was a sad blow to the social ambitions of the family. With one daughter in the height of bellehood and another having just made her debut, the Leiters had arranged a social campaign of great splendor. On the very day that ushered in the short season of nine weeks the home was damaged by fire. The most pathetic thing about the disaster was the destruction of a part of the Parisian wardrobe of the young ladies, recently imported at a cost of $4,000.

Poor Nannie Leiter, bundled out of bed and the house in great haste, caught a glimpse of a number of her blackened and burned Worth gowns, and straightway went into hysterics. At the house of Mr. Rock, a neighbor, she lost all control of herself for a time and filled the air with her lamentations. Her grief was short lived, however, and she is now as gay and charming as ever in the full whirl of Washington society. The rental paid by Mr. Leiter to Mr. Blaine has been generally overstated. When Mr. Leiter took the house he did pay $11,500 a year, but when the lease was renewed some time ago the rental was reduced to $8,000 a year and the taxes and insurance, or $8,500 in all.—Washington Cor. Chicago Herald.

Combined Chair and Desk.

A combination chair and desk has been designed for use in apartments where economy of space is necessary. The back of the chair constitutes the desk, which is held in position by bolts passing through the rear standards of the chair back. In this manner it is pivoted and can be readily turned down. A pair of jointed braces pivoted to the sides of the desk and to the inner sides of the standards supports the desk at a proper inclination. It is supplied with a swinging ink well, pen and trays and compartments for stamps and stationery. A large drawer under the seat forms a receptacle for books and heavy stationery. When not in use as a desk it is closed up, being held in position by turn buttons.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

They Changed the Address.

George Grossmith tells a story of how the income tax people once overreached themselves. After his father's death they sent in a first notice, assessing his income at £2,000. Taking the document George wrote across the face of it: "I am glad to learn my father is doing so well in the next world; £2,000 a year is a good deal more than he ever earned in this. Kindly forward this notice to his new address, and remember me affectionately to him."

He then posted the notice back to the office. They presumably took the hint, for no more claims have been received at George, junior's, house.—London Tit-Bits.

Uncle Simon Remarks.

Having heard of the attempt of a citizen of the town to commit suicide by cutting his throat, Uncle Simon sagely remarked: "Well, if he'd a severated the bugle vein, there wouldn't a bin any alternity under the panickes o' heaven!"—Lewiston Journal.

MISS CORA V. DIEHL was elected register of Deeds in Logan County, Oklahoma. Her opponents carried the case into the courts. The choice of the people was sustained, and now the pretty alliance girl takes the office and a large section of accrued salary.

NOTING the fact that another heiress has married her father's coachman, the Kansas City Times remarks: "After all, the father of marriageable girls would better ride a bicycle and let the women folks take the street car." But street cars often have good looking conductors with eyes peeled for the main chance.

DR. HARDWICK, surgeon of the hospital at Sheffield, after twenty years' experience, concludes that he can cure cancer and lupis without the knife. His system appears to have been announced simultaneously to the physicians of Vienna by Professor von Moretz. Dr. Hardwick has not yet publicly explained his treatment, but he invites his medical brothers to examine it.

MR. ROMANES, of London, has an ape that he has taught to count—not very far up, indeed, but as high as five. He knows the numbers and the words that indicate them. His method is to take straws one by one into his mouth until one less than the required number have been collected; then taking up an additional straw, he hands it over, together with those in his mouth.

MISS BLANCHE MICHELE of Brooklyn ought to be a happy woman. She found a man under her bed the other day, and when a policemon came in and gathered the fellow to his starlit bosom she opened a closet door and found another stowaway. Women who have regularly looked under their beds every night for fifty years and never found anything unusual there, should unite in congratulations to the lucky fair one.

AT Rocky Hill, Conn., the other day, lightning shook hands with Farmer W. H. Stevens in the most cordial manner. He was in the shed at S. F. Wright's house and had a piece of a scythe in his hands. The thunderbolt took the iron out of his hands, threw it into one corner of the shed, and jumped Stevens into an opposite corner. Mr. Steven says that when the lightning took hold of him he felt as if a fountain had burst inside him and spauted pins and needles into every part of his body.

AN idea of the depression of values in country real estate in England may be gathered from the sales wired by Edmund Yates to a New York paper: The small agricultural estate of Higher Week, North Devon, which cost 5300 pounds just thirteen years ago, sold the other day for 3400 pounds. There is however, nothing exceptional in this ruinous decline of value. I heard recently of property in Lincolnshire which cost 4300 pounds about twenty years ago, mortgageed for 3000, and the mortgagees, in utter despair, offered the property by action for 1500 pounds, but there was no bid.

SOME of the friends of a Portland young man called on him the other evening, says the Lewiston Journal, and had a pleasant time, but long after midnight he commeneed to wonder why they did not thank him for his hospitality and leave for home. As dawn approached he abruptly left the room. After a few minutes had passed, as the young man did not return, the party went to search for him. They found him on the front steps looking anxiously about. He was peering over the fence and poking about in corners. "What are you looking for?" said one of the party. "Oh, I was just looking for the morning paper," replied the host. It worked.

A STRANGE bird, which has attracted the attention of hundreds of people, is on exhibition on the farm of John Rodabaugh, a farmer living six miles east of St. Mary's, Ohio. The bird resembles an owl very much in form, has a head shaped like a heart, the face of a monkey, a snowy white fur adorning its face, while the feathers are of a beautiful yellowish gray, with the tail of a turkey. The bird was caught a few weeks ago while the family were returning home from church, and not until it received a load of shot did it allow itself to be taken captive, and then its captor was fearfully lacerated in the fight that ensued. It utters the squeal of a pig, and is fed wholly on small birds, which it takes into its beak alive, throwing out the bones and feathers afterward.

At a special election at Detroit to vote on the issuing of bonds for water works, the proposition was carried by a decided majority.

Gustave Johnson was declared insane by Probate Judge Ayer and sent to St. Peter. He has been in Duluth about two months working. His family are at St. Cloud.

The directors of the Riverside Milling Company of Little Falls have just held their annual meeting. The principal stock holders are from Cincinnati. They found things in a very satisfactory condition.

There is another strike among the workmen putting in the mains for waterworks at Albert Lea, this time a raise being wanted from $1,50 to $2 per pay, but some claim it was for back pay.

Oscar Davenport, Hank Driscoll and Fuller Mitchell were taken to jail at Faribault, being sentenced to 50, 40 and 10 days respectively under the Schaffer law.

Joseph Labo, of Buffalo while riding with Miss Evelyn Payne, of Minneapolis, was thrown out of the buggy by his horse running away. As he is 70 years old, the injuries may prove fatal.

J. D. Stout, principal of the Canton public school, mysteriously disappeared from the Park Hotel, at Preston the other morning. Neighbors are searching for him. He had only been married a few weeks.

Sheriff Quinn arrested Julius Schultzer at Sauk Rapids fiendishly punishing his 9-year-old son. He grasped the boy by the feet swinging him over his head on to the ground inflicting injuries which may prove fatal.

The new creamery building at Lake Crystal was totally destroyed by fire the other morning. It had only been running three months. The plant was considered to be worth between $3,000 and $4,000. There was $2,500 insurance.

The following instructors have been engaged at Red Wing Seminary for the coming year: Professors. G. O. Brohough, C. A. Hill, H. H. Elstad, and one yet to be engaged for the preparatory department; Professor H. H. Bergsland and Rev. O. S. Meland for the theological department.

John A. Anderson, of Madison, threshed out 658 bushels and 20 pounds of wheat from 15¼ acres of ground. This shows a yield of 43½ bushels per acre. It weighed 61 pounds to the measured bushel at the Pacific elevator.

The first shipment of this year's wheat has just been made from Marshall. The wheat yielded a little over twenty-five bushels to the acre, graded No. 1, and tested, in the dirt, sixty-two pounds. We never had such crops before. Wheat will all grade No. 1.

What is supposed to be a skeleton was discovered 135 feet below the surface in a well being drilled at Hokah for J. J. Hohl. The bones were brought up in small pieces and seem to be well preserved. They were examined but it was impossible to determine the nature or to what species it belongs.

A 5-year-old boy of Ole Brown, of Christiana township, Jackson county, set fire to a lot of straw surrounding his father's barn. Discovering what he had done the little fellow crawled into the barn where the flames overtook and cremated him. Two horses, four head of cattle and a number of harnesses were also burned.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Two Children of Mrs. Ruthven died of diphtheria at Sioux Falls. They were by a former husband, Freeman Potter of Iowa, who came over and nursed them until they died.

At a joint meeting of the Knights of Labors and Miners' Unions of Lead City, Central City and Deadwood, it was decided to hold their celebration of Labor Day in this city, Sept. 1. About 2,000 members of the different unions will be in line.

C. K. Neff's warehouse, at Groton containing $600 worth of hardware burned. The stock is fully insured. The building was owned by L. Sanders; no insurance; value, $100. The fire originated by the proprietor stepping on a match.

A man supposed to be an escaped convict from the Wisconsin penitentiary was arrested at Yankton. He refuses to divulge his name, but his overhalls are marked "M. Dale. No. 1," and the authorities are satisfied they have the right man.

The annual encampment of the Knights of Pythias of the Black Hills, will be held in Custer, commencing Sept, 24, and continue for three days. It will be the largest encampment ever held in the Western part of the state. A large amount of money has been raised by the citizens for the occasion. A grand excursion upon Lake Custer will be one of the main features of the meeting,

J. M. Bailey, president of the Minnehaha National bank of Sioux Falls who has been ill for several months and who has just returned from Europe, where he went for his health, is now lying in a precarious condition at his father's home in Freeport Ills. Even if he recovers, his physicians say he will not be able to do any business for three months at least.

The cattle shipped from Minneola recently have been of a better quality than ever sent to the Eastern markets from the Northwestern ranges. The Continental Cattle Company shipped 1,200 head of four-year old steers that netted them $71.50 per head in Chicago. The Driskill Bros. shipped 40 carloads—840 head—of 3-year-old steers that brought $56 net per head in the same market. Cattle are fatter and better upon the western South Dakota ranges this season than they have ever been known to be before in the history of cattle raising in the Black Hills.

Hon. S. W. Bowman, deputy land commissioner, is at work in the Black Hills country. He is in the Western part of the state for the purpose of selecting and locating government lands which are due the state for school purposes. He found several thousand acres in Butte and Meade counties, and will visit Fall River counties, but does not expect to find any land either in Pennington, Custer or Fall River counties. The department has refused to allow any of the lately ceded Sioux lands to be entered by the state. Mr. Bowman has no expectation of finding anything near enough to cover the state's deficiency.

NORTH DAKOTA,

Col. Plummer and Deputy Olsgaard made arrangements for the opening of the Minot land office Oct. 1.

Bella, the 12-year-old daughter of Martin Rood, a prominent farmer of Manvel, while playing with her sister remarked she felt ill and immediately fell over, dying in a few moments. No cause can yet be assigned for her sudden death.

A peculiar case was filed with the clerk of the supreme court. It is the case of Gould vs. the Duluth & Dakota Elevator Company, and the peculiarity about it is that both parties appeal for the decision of the trial court.

About two thousand people attended a public reception to Bishop Shanley at Fargo on his taking possesion of his new residence here, which stands in beautiful grounds of seven and a half acres on the river bank, about three blocks from the heart of the city.

J. B. Wineman, chief grain inspector, will soon open his office at Fargo and complete arrangements for the inspection of all grain in the Eastern part of the state. The general opinion among farmers seems to be favorable to the measure. They believe it will insure an increased price for North Dakota product,

General Agent Sims of the M. & N. Elevator Company of Grand Forks states that when the wheat now ripening is ready for market he shall contique to take care of wheat for farmers just as he has in the past. Farmers will insist on the elevator companies handling it for them, notwithstanding the action of the elevator companies.

At a recent meeting of the pharmaceutical association of this state, resolutions were passed asking the attorney-general for his opinion in regard to the purchasing of affidavits or druggists permits for the sale of liquor. The law says that each druggist shall return to the county auditor each month all affidavits he has on hand whether used or not and this was the point objected to. Druggists, instead of buying a new supply of blanks each month, would like to utilize the unsold blanks of the previous month and return only those used. The attorney-general interprets the law as printed and say there is no other course for the druggists to pursue.

WISCONSIN.

August Ekshorn, 25 years old, was drowned while bathing in the Namekagon river at Hayward. The body was recovered.

News has reached Chippewa Falls of the death by drowning of the 12-year-old son of Mr. Preblein Drywood creek, 10 miles from this city.

A resident of Cadott, brings information of the suicide of John Rusk in that village. He blew his brains out. Domestic trouble is assigned as the cause.

Louis Nade has left for Alaska where he will bring suit against parties who it is alleged fraudulently secured an interest in his silver mine property at St. James Bay.

The eight year old son of Jame Donovan a prominent resident of Chippewa Falls received fatal injuries recently by being run over by a team of horses, hitched to a heavy load.

James O'Hara of Chippewa Falls nurses a badly broken leg the result of an encounter with James Haley, a business competitor. Money differences led to the trouble.

The new whaleback barge No. 115 will be launched at West Superior soon. No. 116 will be launched at a date in the near future. Work of preparation for a busy winter's work at the ship yard is now in progress.

David Sideman, a Jewish peddler, has been arrested on instruction from the authorities at Darlington, this state, where he is wanted for larceny. Sideman claims o have rich friends in Chicago, to whom he has telegraphed for assistance.

The august term of the circuit court opened at West Superior with Judge Marshall on the bench. The calendar contains 230 civil cases but only 13 is criminal. It is expected the term will occupy about four weeks. The case of the State vs. Nels Lunding was commenced. The defendant is charged with highway robbery.

The new M. E. Church of Chetek was dedicated with imposing and impressive ceremonies. The following clergymen were present from abroad: Rev. Bushnell, of Bayfield, Wis.; the presiding elder; S. Shirin, of St. Paul; Rev. Pepper, of Barron; Rev. Brown, of Cadet River; Mr. Sanderson and Rev. Good, of Chetek.

It is reliably stated that the American Steel Barge Company, of West Superior is already outlining plans for employing the steel whalebacks on the Mississippi river. The river cities and individual interests looking to a betterment of ocean and river commerce are co-operating to that end. The whaleback vessels, with the advantage they have over the ocean craft as respects less draught, combined with equal carrying capacity, can traverse the river from St. Louis to the gulf.

IOWA,

Mrs. Winfield W. Mossman, wife of a prominent farmer living near Urbana, suicided by hanging. No cause known.

The great packing house of Jas, Booge & Sons, Sioux City, was sold to the Union Stock Yards Company.

Clarence Risdon, a 6-year-old boy at Troy Mills, was kicked in the head by a horse, fracturing the skull. It is not thought he can live.

While "playing doctor" at Burlington the young son of James Moore poured carbolic acid down his little brother's ear, causing an agonizing death.

The retreat of the Dominick sisters, at Sinsinnawa Mound, closed with the reception of quite a number of novices and postulants. A large number of visitors were present.

During a storm that raged at Cedar Rapids the other night lighting struck the barn of Mr. Selick, a farmer living near Marcen, which together with four horses and contents burned. Loss over $1,000.

The two sharpers who swindled Dave King out of $2,000 at Algon were received upon payment of the $2,000 besides fines and costs amounting in all to $2,600. They left for Chicago.

The two children of Albert White of Moulton, had a thrilling experience while out picking berries. A pack of wolves got after them and chased them some distance, and but for the interference of a farmer with a gun might have overpowered them.

Robert R. Reynolds, of Anamosa, while bathing in the Wapsie river, gave out and drowned. Clyde Lamson, who was in the water with him attempted to save him but narrowly escaped himself, only breaking lose from Reynolds after both had gone down twice.

A Waterloo special says: A terrible electric storm visited this section doing much damage. A barn was struck by lightning and burned, together with a horse and several vehicles. Several stacks of hay and grain were burned and the electric lights were struck eight times.

The attendance at the annual meeting of the grand lodge, Knights of Pythias, at Sioux City is the greatest in the history of the order. There were 1,000 delegates in attendance. The Iowa brigade, uniform rank, held a meeting to exemplify the secret work of the order. There is a lively contest over the election of officers.

A man named Arlington and four others were taken before Squire Moon at Cresco, and fined for attempting to defraud Hotelkeeper W. Strother out of their board bill. These fellows have been going about the village and country taking pictures to enlarge, and collecting 50 cents in advance. It has been learned that there is no such company as the one they pretend to represent. They have collected several hundred dollars in this vicinity. They have been rearrested on a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses.

A VERY SHREWD FOX.

He Managed to Escape From an Island by Simulating Death.

A recent writer tells an anecdote which, though taxing belief, he says is vouched for by an eyewitness of the affair. Some fishermen on the west coast of Ireland were in the habit of going to a small island a few hundred yards from the mainland, in quest of bait. The island was inhabited by large numbers of rabbits, and could be reached at low tide by wading, the water there being only a few inches deep. One morning they went in their boat quite early, it being high tide, and on landing saw a dead fox lying on the beach. Th efur of the animal was all bedraggled, and he seemed to have been drowend. One of the men, remarking that his skin was worth something, pitched him into the boat.

Procuring their bait they returned to the mainland, and the man who had possessed himself of the fox seized him by the tail and flung him on the shore. As soon as the animal struck the beach he picked himself up with considerable agility for a dead fox, and shot off like a flash up among the cliffs, while the men stood staring at each other in mute astonishment. The men concluded that he had crossed over to the island during the night when the tide was low, in search of rabbits and finding in the morning he was cut off from the mainland, counterfeited death, with the expectation of thereby procuring a passage to the shore in a boat, an expectation which was fully realized.—Boston Courier.

He Wanted to Know.

The Trappist monastery situated in Kentucky is the home of those monks upon whom the injunction of perpetual silence is placed. The stories that sift through to the outside world, with more or less romantic detail, concerning the individual monks of La Trappe are many. There is one told of a brother at Gethsemane which is old but full of dramatic suggestion. He was a soldier of Napoleon, so it was said, and after the emperor's first abdication took the cowl of the "Brown brothers" and ultimately came to Gethsemane.

Forty years he lived in silence, hearing nothing of the world's history, but with one item of curiosity left unquenched. When he came to die and was lifted from his hard couch and laid upon the harder floor, strewn with straw, when all followers of the order must meet extremes, the abbot, as is customary, told him he was at liberty to ask any questions he desired. "What became of the emperor?" the old man asked promptly, and then for the first time learned Napoleon's fate, long years after that restless clay had become dust.—Richmond State.

DIED LIKE A HERO.

Three Lives Lost in the Treacherous Waters of the Red Lake River.

Rev. Currie of Grand Forks and Two Young Ladies the Unfortunate Ones.

GRAND FORKS, N. D., Special Telegram, Aug. 18.—Rev. W. T. Currie, rector of St. Paul's Episcopal church in this city, his daughter Ruth, aged fifteen, and Miss Dora Van Kirk, aged sixteen, were drowned while bathing in Red Lake river this afternoon.

A party of young people had been in the water for some time. The two young ladies got beyond their depth and were carried under by the current. Mr. Currie went to save them, but was drowned with them. Another young lady and a son of Mr. Currie had a narrow escape from drowning. The bodies were recovered just below the place where drowned.

Mr. Currie leaves a widow and two children. He was an able writer as well as preacher.

INDECENT EXPOSURE.

Serious Charge Against Two Prominent Eau Claire Men.

EAU CLAIRE, Wis., Special Telegram, Aug. 18.—To-day complaints were made in the municipal court against W. A. Radcliffe and Daniel R. Scammon, charging them with indecent exposure. The affair has created a sensation from the fact that Radcliffe, who is a St. Louis man, has for several years been secretary of the supreme chancellor of the Knights of Pythias of the world, and is past supreme representative from Missouri, and has held other high positions in the order which have given him a national reputation.

The complaints were signed by Delia Wuerch, a dressmaker. Radcliffe and Scammon on Sunday afternoon, the time the offense is alleged to have been commited, were at the window of a room in the third story of a hotel, while Miss Wuerch and four lady friends, two of them from Neillsville, were at the residence across the way.

The offense is charged in the complaints to have been of an exceedingly gross nature. Two policemen were sent into the hotel at the time, went up stairs and forced the two, who were intoxicated, to desist.

After the officers had left the hotel Scammon came down into the street and, it is alleged, assaulted Officer Elliott, who got the better of Scammon and placed him in the lock up, where he remained about three hours, when he was released for the time being. The defendants are to be arraigned to-morrow.

EDITORS AT PLAY.

They Drive Dull Care Away on the Shores of Beautiful Lake Ripley.

LITCHFIELD, Minn., Special, Aug. 18.—The Minnesota Editorial association is taking a week's outing at Brightwood, on the north shore of Lake Ripley, one and a half miles south of Litchfield, and a jolly time the members are having. This outing was arranged by the executive committee of the association, and is largely in charge of F. S. Verbeck, chairman of the committee, to whose genius its success may be mainly attributed.

Lake Ripley is a beautiful sheet of water, about a mile across, with a gravelly beach on all shores but the south, where it is skirted by a native forest, in which Brightwood is located. A pleasant drive has been made around the lake. In the neighborhood are many other lakes that give excellent opportunities for fishing. Altogether it affords an excellent place for a quiet week, and it is being improved by those present, each in his own way.

The citizens of Litchfield have made arrangements for some special entertainment each afternoon and evening.

Yesterday many of the visitors attended services at Litchfield in the morning. In the afternoon special services were held in the Brightwood pavilion, and the editors and their ladies listened to an eloquent sermon by Rev. O. H. P. Smith of Litchfield.

THE RAIN MAKERS.

They are Busy With Preparations for a Decisive Experiment.

MIDLAND, Tex., Aug. 18.—The rain makers are busy with preparations and propose Monday or Tuesday as the time for the decisive experiment. Professors Meyer and Custallar, balloonists, and Prof. Roselle, chemist, are manipulating the explosives, but so much remains to be done that the opinion prevails that there will be no rain produced before Thursday.

The rain of Tuesday is thought not to have been caused by the explosion except as a coincidence. They are, however hopeful of success in the final test.

About fifty balloons inflated with explosive gas, as many kites with dynamite tails, and on terra firma mortars of rind rock will be discharged, not simultaneously but in rapid succession, while scientific observations will be taken by balloonists in mid air, and Gen. Dyrenforth on earth, connected by telephone. The programme is elaborate and the material abundant, and the science involved exhaustive. Success means the regeneration of this country.

Dairymen Want More Money.

NORTHFIELD, Minn., Special, Aug. 18.—Some dissatisfaction is again being expressed by the farmer dairymen who sell their milk to the creameries in this vicinity on account of the stationary price paid for milk, when the price for butter has again risen. They think there should be some commensurate proportion between the prices, as when one is higher the other certainly should also be worth more. In consequence of this dissatisfaction the milk receipts are quite small in comparison to what they were, and it is feared that if this inequality is kept up farmers will dispose of their stock and turn their attention to something else. There has, however, never been very much money in dairying, and if the price paid for cattle, $12 to $20 per head, was not so small they would probably have given it up long ago. Northfield and vicinity is well adapted for this branch of farming, however, and it is regretted that those engaged in this pursuit should find any cause for grievance.

Killed by a Switch Target.

ST. CLOUD, Minn., Special, Aug. 18.—Joseph Heinzmann, car repairer on the Northern Pacific train No. 1 between St. Paul and Little Falls, was killed Saturday night at Rice's, fifteen miles from here. The man had a hot box to look after and while watching it as the train, which does not stop at Rice's, was dashing through there, he leaned too far out and struck the switch light, the whole back of his head being crushed in and his brain exposed. The deceased was a single man, aged about twenty-five years, and had no relatives living in this country.

THERE MAY BE WAR.

Chinamen Must Stop Their Fooling or Take a Dose of Powder.

SHANGHAI, Aug. 18.—A serious state of political affairs exists in China, and the combined fleets of the powers may be called upon at any moment to take effective action.

In this city great excitement prevails at the increasing tension between the Chinese authorities and the foreign ministers. The former are obstinate in their refusal to redress the injury done to foreigners during the recent riots. There is no reason to doubt that if the authorities do not yield concerted action by the combined war vessels is imminent.

Such is the state of affairs, and it is now known that the foreign ministers have been compelled to inform the Chinese government that a joint naval demonstration of an effective nature, in which the French, American British and German squadrons will take part, will be ordered in the near future unless speedy reparation is made for the injuries, outrages and abuses complained of by the ministers of the powers.

Naturally the foreign population of this city, being aware of the firm stand taken by the ministers, and, having knowledge of the ultimatum sent to the Chinese government, is in a state of considerable anxious expectation, and will so remain until the reply of the Chinese government is made known.

CAUGHT RED HANDED.

A Former Minnesotan Charged With Burglary and Attempted Outrage.

SPOKANE FALLS, Wash., Special Telegram, Aug. 18.—Herman Simon, a laborer, was arrested this morning charged with burglary. Another complaint will be filed charging him with attempt at criminal assault upon Lena Workman, aged twenty years, and Sadie Workman, aged sixteen years.

The Workman family and Simon, who is married and has children, live in Walla Walla addition to Seattle and are neighbors. Early this morning, it is alleged, Simon sneaked into the Workman domicile and chloroformed Mr. and Mrs. Workman, who slept down stairs. Making sure that they were asleep, he procured a ladder and climbed up to the attic of the small house, where were sleeping the two girls. The girls slept in separate beds, and while he was chloroforming the older of the two younger awoke and, recognizing the man, screamed wildly for help. Her cries did not awaken her parents, who were fairly under the influence of the drug, but neighbors came to the rescue and Simon fled.

A warrant was immediately sworn out charging him with burglary. He was caught this evening, having been in hiding all day. The residents of Walla Walla addition are much incensed over the affair and for a time threatened summary justice should the guilty man fall into their hands. Both families emigrated to Washington from Minnesota several years ago.

LAND CONTESTS.

Rights of Indians to Allotted Land and Settlers Who Claim Title.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Aug. 18.—Commissioner Carter has determined to try the issue of the rights between Indians who have been allotted lands on the Sioux reservation and settlers who claim title in some of them.

In reply to inquiries by the register of the land office at Pierre, S. D., he has directed that in all cases contests brought by white settlers against Indian allotments notice of the contest shall be mailed to the Indian who claim is assailed, in care of the Indian agent, and duplicate copies of such notice shall be sent direct to the agent in charge of the tribe and also to the allotment agent at the time on duty in the vicinity of the agency. The agent and the allotment agent will be expected to prepare and present such defense as the Indian may have, and the hearing will proceed in the local office and in the department precisely as other contested cases.

It is expected that the Indian office will not recognize the right of the settlers to contest an Indian's allotment, and will probably enter the plea of non-jurisdiction of the general or local land offices.

CALLAPSING.

The Charges Against Judge Andrews Will Probably Be Dropped.

WATERTOWN, Special Telegram, Aug. 18.—The investigation into the charges against Judge J. O. Andrews, of the third judicial circuit to-morrow by the bar of the circuit, is looked upon by many as a fizzle. In fact many seem to think at this hour that there will either be a postponement or the entire matter dropped. Certain it is that several attorneys who have been egging on the charges and helping to gather evidence are now confronted with the idea that a majority of the attorneys, if an investigation is held, will decide favorable for the judge whether he is guilty of the preferred charge or not. There is a certain animus behind the investigation that is too transparent for deception and a jealousy that insures sympathy which otherwise would not exist.

A large number of attorneys will be present, at any rate, and a canvass of the circuit has been taken, which seems to indicate that no action will be taken, or if so, that the charges will not be sustained. It seems to have petered out greatly in the past day or two.

A Criminal Lowyer.

Here is a San Jose law story from the repertory of W. L. Gill: A young lawyer, a friend of his, not noted for intelligence succeeded in having a client acquitted of murder. Meeting him a few days afterwards Gill was quite warm in congratulations.

"Yes," said the young lawyer, mopping his brow. "I got him off, but it was a narrow 'scape."

"A narrow escape? how?" inquired Gill.

"Ah, the tightest squeeze you ever saw. You know I examined the witnesses and made the argument myself, the plea self-defence. The jury was out two whole days. Finally the judge called them before him and asked what the trouble was."

"'Only one thing, your honor,' replied the foreman. 'Was the prisoner's attorney retained by him or appointed by the court?'

"'No, gentlemen; the prisoner is a man of means,' said the judge, 'and hired his own attorney.'"

"I could not see what bearing the question had on the evidence," continued Mr. Gill's young friend, "but ten minutes later in filed the jury, and what do you think the verdict was?"

"What?" asked Gill.

"Why, not guilty, on the ground of insanity."

Pennsylvania Republicans.

HARRISBURG, Pa., Aug. 18.—Less than half a hundred candidates and delegates are here for the Republican state convention on Wednesday, and it promises to be rather a tame affair unless considerable enthusiasm is injected into it between now and the hour of meeting. All the candidates, except Gen. Gregg of Reading, are on the ground, as are also Senator Quay, Chairman Andrews and others. The general impression to-night is that the ticket will be Gregg for auditor general and Price for state treasurer, although the latter has not yet given his consent to the arrangement, his idea being that the order should be reversed.

THE FARMER'S CORNER.

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO RURAL READERS.

Fertilizing New Land—Farm Butter-Making—Influence of Food on Quality of Butter—Ringing Hogs—Mid-summer Mistakes.

Fertilizing New Land.

The Northwestern Farmer discusses the subject at length for the benefit of Montana, Dakota and Minnesota farmers. But while we give the article for what it is worth we would say to Montna farmers to farm their land alternate years, summer follow and irrigate the land thoroughly in the fall and our word for it twenty years of cultivation will find it producing as much as it did the first few years, proving this our contemporary says:

The subject of fertilizing lands throughout the newer portions of Minnesota, and throughout the Dakotas and Montana, may not be regarded, by some, as one which they are just yet interested in. The common remark heard, with respect to the fertility of some of these new lands, is that such a farm has been cultivated to wheat for ten, twelve or even fifteen years successively, without the use of fertilizers. One large farmer in North Dakota coolly informed the writer that he calculated that there was fertility enough in his farm to give him good returns as long as he lived, and as he had no immediate family, he thought posterity could find some way to bring fertility back to his land if they wanted to. To be sure this was quite a philosophical as well as an extremely selfish view of the subject. No sort of argument will fit such a man's case, but to the other ninety-nine farmers in a hundred, fertilizing is an important consideration and it is a very exceptionally good farm that can stand many years of consecutive drain upon its storred fertility—and isn't it a foolish waste of nature's bounty to exhaust her strength before giving anything back to sustain it? We all know that it takes longer to build up, than to destroy. Worn-out lands require a great amount of expense to bring back a paying fertility.

It would be well, for those who have not given much thought to fertilizing their lands, to study this subject. A few simple experiments should be made to see whether it would not even pay them now, a good profit on the investment, to ascertain in what particular their soil is deficient, and then substitute a fertilizer to fill the requirements. Our agricultural colleges, through their chemical departments, would do a vast amount of service, that would be eminently practical, by giving any farmer, who applies for it, a free analysis of his soil, and also inform the applicant what is required to supply the deficiency, and thus increase the yield upon his farm.

Influence of Food on Quality of Butter.

Bulletin 13 of the New Hampshire experiment station reports as the result of experiments testing the effects of food on butter:

1st. That gluten meal tends to produce a much softer quality of butter than corn meal or cottonseed meal; and, other things being equal, tends to lessen the churnability of butter fat.

2d. That with the same cows the hardness of butter depends much more upon the character of the food than upon the nutritive ratio.

3d. That ensilage produces a somewhat softer butter than does good hay, but it is also favorable to the flavor and texture of the butter product.

4th. That skim milk has a very favorable effect upon the churnability and quality of the butter fat, and in a single trial apparently reversed the general rule that the volatile fatty acids decrease as the period of lactation advances.

5th. That cottonseed meal tends to produce an unusually hard quantity of butter, and that cottonseed meal and gluten meal might be used together with excellent results.

6th. That contrary to general belief the melting point of butter fat is not a good index of the commercial hardness of butter. That while in general a soft butter melts at a lower temperature than a hard butter, there is no definite relation between melting point and actual hardness.

7th. That no relation can be traced between food and volatile fatty acids, accept in the case of skimmilk. That usually hardness and volatile acids very inversely, hardness generally increasing and volatile acids decreasing, as the period of lactation advances.

A Test for Lime in Soil.

A chemical analysis will tell whether a soil has an abundance or a deficiency of lime and other materials which go toward supplying needed plant food. It requires an expert chemist to determine this, and no method has, as yet, been devised by which a farmer can analyze his own soil. But a simple method has been devised by which any farmer can tell whether his soil has enough lime or not. Take a few shovelfulls of soil from different parts of the field, and dry, pulverize and mix them thoroughly. Take a few ounces of this, powder it, and burn it to ashes on an iron shovel over a fire. Put these ashes in a glass tumbler when cooled and mix with them as much water as it will take to cover them. Stir this with a glass rod or wooden stick, but not with anything metallic. To this paste add an ounce of hydrochloric acid, which is commonly sold as muriatic acid or spirits of salts, the mixture being stirred all the time. If a pretty brisk effervescence takes place it may be taken for granted that the soil contains a fair proportion of lime; but if little or no effervescence takes place, the soil contains little or no lime.—American Agriculturist.

Farm Butter-Making.

Can all the washing and working be done in the churn? When is the proper time to salt? Why does butter sometimes come out of a print mould rough? As the above questions are often asked, we are pleased to see them answered in the following from the Orange Judd Farmer: "The cream should not be too old but should be sour; when ready for churning test the temperature with a thermometer; it should be as low as 58° in warm weather and from 60° to 63° when cold. If cream is too thick it may be thinned with water. When the butter has gathered to the size of peas, draw off the buttermilk and wash butter by pouring in clear, cold water, and churning. Repeat this until the water is clear when drawn off. Draw off water, and sprinkle the salt in upon the butter; churn as before so as to thoroughly mix the salt into the butter, which will now be in a compact mass. Let it harden a few hours; then work the remaining buttermilk out, being careful not to work more than neccessary. Do not use the hands. Print the butter when the buttermilk has been worked out. If the butter print is well soaked in water before using the pats will be smooth."

Ringing Hogs.

The following novel plan for ringing hogs may be of service for those who practice it: Take a stick, say an old fork handle three or four feet long, and one inch from end bore ⅜ hole; four inches from this hole bore another ⅜ inch hole. Then take a ⅜ inch rope and run through first hole with a knot on the end of the rope. Then run through the second hole and leave a loop, the lower end of which is five inches from the stick. Tie a knot on upper side of stick, then cut the surplus rope off and you have a long holder. Take the stick in your hands with the rope loop hanging down, walk up to the hog, reach the stick out and slip the noose over his nose and with a quick motion move your hands over his back; pull back a little and twist on your stick; the same as you would put a twitch on a horse's nose, and you have your hog. He won't move as long as you keep the rope twisted. After you have rung two or three and got used to it you can take your rings and ringers and ring 100 hogs an hour easily. I always ring mine and my neighoor's hogs alone. If a hog is inclined to be ugly so much the better, for when he opens his mouth to bite you have him, for there will be no trouble getting the rope over his nose.

Midsummer Mistakes.

The farmer is likely to let the pigs and lambs care for themselves for a season, just now, says the Orange Judd Farmer. It is bad policy, however, as this is a critical time when thought and care do much for the young things. It is a mistake to allow a full diet of corn now with the intention of substituting shorts, oats, etc., after harvest. The "frame material" will come into the building too late to add the needed strength. The right method is the only successful one for feeding breeding stock. If one has no regular pasture for the swine, it should be provided from a corner of the meadow at once. After August 1 weaning lambs can be turned into the corn field, having by this time gleaned the stubble field of the small grain. They will eat much of the useless grass and weeds as well as the lower blades from the corn stalks. This policy is much wiser than to allow them to continue on the stale stubble or on parched and exhausted pastures, already overstocked. By this change the regular pasture can be permitted to grow a full aftermath for early winter feeding.

Want of Care.

At first farm drainage was, in some respects, a failure on account of using tile that were too small and having them imperfectly laid. The farmers are now digging them up and putting in larger tile and laying them with the use of a level. One of our best and most intelligent farmers will not have a tile laid until a survey is made and the levels taken by a competent man. Farmers are also putting branches or streams of considerable size underground into tile; streams that it was once thought impossible to bury in this way. A stream near our factory has been tiled in this way and the land produced 100 bushels of corn per acre the first year after being ditched, which paid the expense of ditching and a fair profit besides. Large ditches are cut from four to five feet deep, thus preparing a large body of earth to absorb the water as it falls. A shallow ditch would not take the water so rapidly. Our tile are all sold of last year's make at fair prices. We make both brick and tile.—O. D. Land, Johnson County, Indiana, in Drainage Journal.

His Pedigree Established.

Three or four youngsters were playing on the dock when a quarrel arose.

"I ain't no kid," exclaimed one, "and you shan't call me that."

"You are, too," urged the aggressor

"I ain't; I'm as big as you are."

"You're a kid, just the same."

"I ain't, neither."

"You are,"

"I ain't,"

"Yes you are, for I heard my pap say your pap was a regular old goat that came home full every night. And what's a young goat but a kid?"

Then the fight began—Detroit Free Press.

THE HARBOR OF DREAMS.

Only a whispering gale
  Flutters the wings of the boat;
Only a bird in the vale
  Lends to the silence a note,
  Mellow, subdued and remote:
This is the twilight of peace,
  This is the hour of release,
  Free of all worry and fret,
  Clear of all care and regret,
  When like a bird in her nest
  Fancy lies folded to rest.

This is the margin of sleep;
  Here let the anchor be cast;
Here in forgetfulness deep,
  Now that the journey is past,
  Lower the sails from the mast.
Here is the bay of content,
  Heaven and earth interblent;
  Here is the haven that lies
  Close to the land of surprise;
  Here all like Paradise seems,
  Here is the harbor of dreams.

His First Victory.

"Private John Allen" of Mississippi, who became the wit of the house of representatives with the death of Sunset Cox, tells a good story on himself of how he came to be a profound lawyer.

A party of members were telling yarns in the cloak-room of the house and when Allen's turn came he told this one:

"I want to tell you of the greatest legal victory of my life," said Allen, as he lighted a cigar and propped his feet against the wall in true southern style. "It was down in Tupelo, during the trying period just after the war. I was at that time a practicing lawyer—that is, I practiced whenever I had any case to practice with. One day old 'Uncle' Pompey, one of the old negroes of the settlement, came into my office and said:

"'Mars John, I wants you to cl'ar me. I'se gwine to be 'rested for stealin' of two hams out'en de cross-road sto.'

"'Well, Pompey,' I asked, 'did you steal the hams?'

"'Mars John, I just took 'em.'

"'Did any one see you?' I asked.

"'Yar, boss,' said the old negro, disconsolately, 'two ol' white buckras.'

"'Well, Pompey,' I replied, 'I can't do anything for you under the circumstances.'

"'Now, Mars John,' said old Pompey, 'here's $10. I jist want you to try.'

"Well, I consented to try," said Allen. "The case was to be heard before an old magistrate named Johnson. He was totally unedacated, and was, moreover, a perfect dictator, and no negro ever came before him who was not fined the maximum penalty and sent to his field to expiate the crime in the sweat of his brow.

"The magistrate heard the case. Every possible proof was brought to show that Pompey stole the hams. There could be no doubt of it from the testimony. I did not put a single question to any of the witnesses, but when the testimony was all in I arose and in my most dignified manner addressed the magistrate:

"'May it please your honor, it would be useless for me to argue the position he holds, and before one who would adorn the Superior if not the Supreme court bench of this grand old commonwealth. And I may say that those who know you best say that you would grace even the Supreme court of the United States, the highest tribunal in the land. It will be useless to dwell upon the testimony. You have heard it, and know the case as well as I do. However, it may not be out of order for me to call your honor's attention to a short passage in the old English law, which clearly decides this case, and which, for the moment, your honor may have forgotten.'

"Then I fished down into my pocket and drew forth, with a great flourish, an old copy of 'Julius Cæsar.' I opened it with great dignity to the first page and read the line which is familiar to every schoolboy: 'Omnia Gallia it partes tres divisa est.' 'That decides the case, said I, throwing the book upon the table. 'That clearly acquits the defendant.'

"With great dignity and solemnity I then took my seat. The old magistrate was completely nonplussed. He looked at me a moment quizzically and scratched his head. Then, turning to Pompey, he raised himself to his full height and said:

"'Pompey, I know you stole them hams, but by the ingenuity, of your lawyer I've got to let you go. Git out,' said he, as he planted his No. 9 in the seat of Pompey's pants, 'and if you ever come here again, lawyer or no lawyer, you git six months.'"—Atlanta Constitution.

It Was Intimidation.

It was in University place. A boy, preceded by a dog, was crossing by one of the paths, when he encountered a woman preceded by a smaller dog. The two canines halted. So did their respective owners. The animals looked at each other fixedly from a distance of six feet, each with his tail waving over his back and each uttering low growls.

"Call off your dog!" exclaimed the woman, as she saw the situation.

"Call off yours," replied the boy.

"Can't you restrain your dog?" she demanded, in a high key.

"He ain't doin' nothin'."

"Yes, he is; he's intimidating my Fido."

"But your Fido is givin' him sass. I ain't goin' to restrain my dog when your dog is a-saying he kin lick him with one hand tied behind him."

"Here, Fido; haven't you more care for your reputation than to face such a low-down dog as that? Come here this instant! I shall punish you for this!"

"Here, Shakspere," said the boy, as he gave his dog a light kick, "you let that animal alone. You tackled one jist like him last fall, and you had indigestion for two months. He ain't alive; he's jist pretendin' to be. He's a stuffed lamb with a dog's tail glued on, and the woman works him with a string. Come along with me and I'll show you a reg'lar live dog down here."—New York Sun.

Keeping at It.

It is a great mistake to suppose that the best work of the world is done by people of great strength and great opportunities. It is unquestionably an advantage to have both these things, but neither of them is a neceessity to the man who has the spirit and pluck to achieve great results. Some of the greatest work of our time has been done by men of physical feebleness. No man has left a more distinct impression of himself on this generation than Charles Darwin, and there have been few men who have had to struggle against such prostrating ill-health. Darwin was rarely able to work long at a time. He accomplished his great work by having a single aim and putting every ounce of his force and every hour of his time into the task which he had set before him. He never scattered his energy, he never wasted an hour, and by steadily keeping at it, in spite of his continual ill-health and long intervals of semi-invalidism, he did a great work, and has left the impression upon the world of a man of extraordinary energy and working capacity. Success is rarely a matter of accident, always a matter of character. The reason why so many men fail is that so few men are willing to pay the price of self-denial and hard work which success exacts.

His Religious Scruples.

The Hon. "Ben" Le Fevre, ex-congressman from Ohio, is very justly noted for always having a good and sufficient excuse for all his misdeeds as well as a ready answer for all perplexing questions. Not long ago he engaged himself to preside at a dinner, and his well-known ability to fill such an office made anticipation run high. But when the time came no "Ben" Le Fevre came with it and the pleasure of the dinner, therefore, was seriously marred. A few days later one of the guests met the ex-congressman and asked him why he was not present. The expression that passed over Le Fevre's face plainly told that he had utterly forgotten the dinner and this was the first time it had been recalled to him. But he gathered himself in an instant and said:

"Why, man, that dinner was on Wednesday."

"Yes."

"Ash Wednesday?"

"Yes."

Le Fevre stopped as if that ought to be explanation enough.

"What has ash Wednesday to do with it? asked the interrogator."

"Why, blank it, man," said "Ben," you don't suppose I would preside at a dinner on ash Wednesday, do you? Do you think I have no religious scruples at all?"—New York Tribune.

A Stimulated Industry.

From Puck.

Political orator (trying to catch votes)—Yes, friends and fellow-citizens, all the wouderful prosperity of this country we owe to foreigners. Our beloved fellow-citizens from foreign lands have made us what we are. The influence of their presence is everywhere, and is felt in trade and manufacturing all over the country. Think of the growth of our manufacturing industries since immigration became marked. By the way, is there a manufacturer in the audience? Ah! I see a hand. Are you a manufacturer, sir?

Stranger—I am.

Orator—"Allow me to ask you a few questions. Your factory is being enlarged every year isn't it?"

Stranger—"Yes, and can't half fill orders yet."

Orator—"Ah, ha! I knew so. And hasn't your trade vastly increased since immigration became so heavy?"

Stranger—"Vastly."

Orator—"I was sure of it. There, fellow-citizens, is the proof before you. By the way, will you please tell the audience what it is you manufacture?"

Stranger—"Burglar alarm."

A Permit for Smoking.

Nowadays Germany might well be called "the smoker.s home." Every German has his pipe and can smoke whenever he will, and within certain limits wherever he will. There are no restrictions against the use of tobacco, and one's desires in that direction are only circumscribed in particular places—such as churches, lecture-rooms, opera houses, etc. But at one time in certain parts of Germany a man dare not walk on the street or highway with a pipe in his mouth without special permission so to do, for which permission he paid a yearly stipend.—Buffalo Commercial.

IT is said that the legal sheriff's fees in New York amount to no more than enough to pay the deputies $40 a month. If that be true, then for years there has been enormous extortion of illegal fees. The deputy sheriff's have notoriously acquired great wealth. They are refusing now to perform the services for the legal fees.

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

The nearer the time, for voting on the bond question, arrives, the more thoroughly does the situation appear to be understood by the farmers. This is the class of individuals who will feel the burden more sensitively than any others. While the condition of the average farmer of Polk county may this year be improved it is nevertheless none too good. Every man who tills tde soil has his full share of taxes to pay. His valuation is known and there is no dodging the issue. The burdensome living for town, county, state and school purposes, not to talk of the tariff which majority construe as a tax, is sufficient to make the father's locks turn hoary at an early age—the son becomes horney handed in youth. This condition of affairs has been established during a long period of misrule. The farmer through negligence has remained at his plow while the law maker was legislating him into a condition of poverty and servitude. This systematic robbery has been established not alone in the halls of congress—not alone in the legislatures of our state but still nearer our thresholds, within the borders of our own county. There were circumstances which led to this state of affairs beyond the control of those who suffered most. This matter of bonding Polk county for a sum to exceed $500,000 comes home to the owner of every quarter section. 'Tis a question of yes or no which the farmer must answer by ballot. The question to be observed by this proposition is—will you derive a sufficient benefit to repay you for the extra tax you are voting upon yourself and children? Do you know or does anyone know where a proposed railroad will be built without first having a permanent survey! Do you know that by voting this tax the price of wheat will advance 3 cents per bushel? Have you positive evidence that a reduction in rates by one common carier will compel other carriers to make rates to correspond with the one reduced? Will the road be built within teaming distance of your farm? Unless these questions can all be answered in the affrmative the arguments of those who favor voting the bonds dwindle into insignificance and the county commissioners should be impeached for signing the agreement with the D & D. railroad.

Fisher Bulletin: The voters of Polk County, having had two weeks reflection over the question of bonding the county in aid of the Duluth and Dakota Railroad, have about decided that the scheme contains a "nigger in a wood pile" and that it is not the farmer who are to be benefitted, but a few capitalists, who are anxious that the road shell be completed at the expense of outsiders. When the term "outsiders" is used we mean that those interested in the railroad project are desirous of securing a valuable piece of property as a present. It is intimated that, should the road secure the two hundred and twenty thousand dollars from the county, the money will eventually become a gift to the road projectors, as history will easily demonstrate that more than three-fifths of the new railway schemes of the county, after having secured liberal donations from counties which they traverse, pass into a reciver's hands and are then sold, the first-mortgage bondholders purchasing the road with their bonds, and thus virtually possessing themselves of a valuable fanchise at less than one-fourth of its cost. A strong opposition to the county assisting the road is being developed in this vicinity, and we are satisfied that the proposition will be killed, as far as this section is concerned. The editor of the Bulletin has made a personal canvass among farmers and others in this vicinity. We have found very few who think favorable of the scheme. The Bulletin was kindly disposed toward the bond scheme, a few day ago, but certain facts have transpired, since that time which induces us to look upon it as one worthy to be let alone by the voters of Polk county.

Polk County Review: Every alliance man in Polk county, who is true to the principles which he advocates, will vote against the bonding of the county for proposed railroad. Why do you continue to be led astray by the fluttering tonuge and wiley promises of those plutocratic lords. Why will you let these corporations continue to suck your life blood and tighten the bands of oppression which now bind you, by voting them aid? Stand firm and maintain your rights.

The Latest.

As we go to press we learn that the proposition of the D. & D. is withdrawn. This is no doubt a scheme to keep the opposing element away from the polls Unless official notice is received, turn out in force and vote against this black intrigue.

PLAIN MISS BARSTOW.

"What nonsense it is for me to stand here gazing into the glass in hope of discovering one good feature in a face every one calls plain! Ah me! I wish I could learn to listen without a pang to the many remarks made on my personal appearance. I am a perfect foil to Emily, and people notice my ugliness because my sister is such a beauty. I see her sought after and admired, while I"——

Lucille Barstow stopped speaking, and, dropping her head in her hands, burst into tears. She did not heed the length and luxuriance of the chestnut hair which enveloped her like a veil. In her opinion Emily's hair was far lovelier than her own. And she was unconscious of the symmetry of her small hands and feet. To their beauty she attached no importance, and thought only of the plain face on which so many of her acquaintances remarked.

She had passed the evening at a ball, and while dancing a quadrille had heard a gentleman in the next set say:

"Isn't the lady in blue and white the one we heard sing so divinely at Mrs. Springer's?"

The reply of his partner came distinctly to Lucille's ears:

"Which young lady? It was the plain Miss Barstow we heard sing. Yes, she is dressed in blue and white, I see. She is the same."

How well Lucille remembered every word! She could sing. No one ever denied the sweetness and strength of her voice, and she had sung her best at Mrs. Springer's. No wonder Geoffrey Wayne had remembered it. Few could forget the beauty of that clear voice, but Lucille would have willingly bartered her voice for a lovely face.

At last the weary girl turned off the gas, and went to bed; but it was long before she could find rest in sleep.

Breakfast was nearly over when Lucille appeared in the dining room the next morning. Her grandmother and sister were just rising from the table.

"Mercy, sis!" cried Emily, "how swollen your eyes are, and you look like a ghost! It doesn't improve your appearance very much to look so woe begone."

"I am not always studying my appearance," answered Lucille, taking a seat at the table.

"Lucille, Geoffrey Wayne spoke to me last night of the excellence of your singing at Mrs. Springer's," said Mrs. Barstow.

"Yes, I heard him speak of it," said Lucille, with a bitter smile, for she remembered that she had also heard the answer of his partner in the quadrille.

"But don't let his praise cause you to have hopes of fascinating him," laughed Emily, "for I have entered the lists, and naturally you will have no chance."

"Naturally, of course," said Lucille.

"Emily, don't fret Lucille this morning. She looks half sick," said Mrs. Barstow, with a fond look at the beauty, whom she idolized.

"I am wholly sick," said Lucille, pushing away her coffee cup. "I wish there was some place on this earth where I could go with the certainty of not hearing the changes rung on my ugliness."

"I am afraid there is no such blissful spot," said Emily. "But I must be off to dress, for Geoffrey Wayne is to call this noon. This is November. I will wager a pair of gloves to you, Lucille, that I have a chance of becoming Mrs. Wayne before January."

"I don't doubt it, so I won't run the risk of losing the gloves," said Lucille, leaving the room.

Geoffrey Wayne came at the time appointed, and Emily, beautifully dressed, flitted down into the parlor, and held out one white dimpled hand in welcome to this tall, golden haired fellow who was so sought after in society.

"Where is your sister? I hoped to have the pleasure of hearing her sing," Mr. Wayne said when he at last arose to go.

"She has a headache. Indeed, she is a perfect martyr to all the petty ills to which flesh is heir," replied Emily. "She cares very little for society, and seldom receives morning calls," she added.

That night Lucille came into her grandmother's room, and knelt beside the low chair in which the old lady sat. She did not speak, and her face looked worn and sad.

"What is the matter, Lulie? Has anything gone wrong?" asked Mrs. Barstow, kissing the upturned brow of her granddaughter.

"Everything is wrong, grandma. I am leading a vain, useless life, and I am tired of it. What does it all amount to—this continual round of balls and parties? It brings no peace, no joy to me, and I am sure I bring no joy to any one else. I hear myself spoken of everywhere as 'the plain Miss Barstow.' It is thus that I am distinguished from Emily Let me go somewhere else, dear grandma. Let me try to be happy in my own way."

"Where do you wish to go, Lucille?" asked the old lady gravely.

"You know Amy Winter, my old schoolmate, who lives in Barristown? Let me go there for a few months. She and her mother live very quietly, and I know they would be quite willing to have me board with them. I could cultivate my voice, and—here I am not happy. I am restless, unsatisfied. I want, I really need a change."

"My highest ambition is to make the orphan children of my poor boy happy," said Mrs. Barstow in a sad tone. "I cannot forget that he consigned them to my care with his dying breath. You shall do as you wish, Lucille; but you will be leaving a luxurious home for a very plain one. Emily seems very happy here; why cannot you be so also?"

"Emily and I are very different," replied Lucille. "She thrusts me into the background always. Perhaps she does not mean to be unkind, but the knowledge of her great beauty and the homage it receives make her selfish and overbearing. I shall be happier for having a change, even though it will be only to dull little Barristown."

Lucille wrote to her friend at once, asking if she could have a home with her for a few months, and the answer came by return mail. The Winters were delighted with the idea of her coming, and hoped she would come at once.

Of course Emily was much surprised at her sister's desire to leave the city in the height of the gay season; but Lucille would listen to no reasoning or arguments, and the end of the week found her in Barristown.

At first she was very well contented with the change she had made. She practiced all her old music, read every book which came in her way and did a large amount of worsted work. But after a while time dragged very heavily. The small circulating library was exhausted, and every bureau and mantle in the house was supplied with worsted mats. The days grew weary again, and Lucille began to question whether she was making a better use of her life in Barristown than she had made in her own home. During this season of doubt a letter came from Emily containing great news.

"Congratulate me, dear Lu," so the letter ran, "for I have bagged my bird. Yes, I am actually engaged to that golden haired Adonis, Geoffrey Wayne, and have a solitaire diamond three times as large as the one Will Gorham gave Mollie Prichard. I was undecided at first between Geof and Count Lazona—do you remember him? Oh, such dark, languishing eyes and such a thrilling voice! But he is poor, and I am not adapted for love in a cottage. It would not suit me even with the count as worshiper. If his old aunt in France would but die conveniently and leave him a fortune! But she won't, of course, and Geof is richer than she is anyhow. He is madly in love with me. Won't you like him for a brother-in-law? When I am married you and grandma can live as humdrum as you please; and you needn't vegetate into the country to avoid being overshadowed by me. The count told me last night that I had a face like a falling star. Wasn't that pretty? Oh, dear, how I wish he were rich! Geof is too dignified to say such things. Send me your congratulations, little plain face. Your turn may come some time. Love in a cottage might suit you admirably; but for heaven's sake don't marry one of those Barristown pumpkins Amy used to tell about."

"What a different letter I should write to her if I should become engaged!" murmured Lucille, allowing the epistle to fall in her lap. "But then Emily and I are not at all alike."

Then she drew her chair to the center table, opened her desk and began the congratulatory letter required of her.

When it was finished she took it to the postoffice herself, for she felt the need of a brisk walk. On her way home she bought a newspaper, and when she reached her own room again threw herself on a comfortable lounge, and began to read. Almost the first thing her eye fell upon was an advertisement for a governess:

"Wanted, a governess for two small children. House in the country. Good salary. English branches only required. None but homely women need apply. Address Mrs. Julia Lamotte, Wildwood Park, Queenstown."

Over and over again did Lucille read this singular advertisement. She knew that none but foolish women ever inserted such strange productions, and wondered what kind of a person Mrs. Lamotte could be.

"She must be jealous of her husband, and won't throw temptation in his way in the shape of a pretty governess," Lucille thought. "I wonder if I would prove homely enough to suit her. I hardly think she would be jealous of 'the plain Miss Barstow,'" and the girl glanced in the long mirror which hung opposite her. "At any rate, I mean to try for the situation. I am tired of the dull monotony of my life here, and yet I can't go back to the old one, only to go through that dreary round of pleasure seeking and dissipation. What an experience it will be to go out as a governess! I will tell Amy at once."

Of course Lucille met with opposition from her friends. They thought she would find the life of a governess very irksome, and that her grandmother wouldn't approve of the plan at all.

"But I can leave the place whenever I please, and I don't intend to tell grandma a word about it. You can forward all her letters to me, and I will send all my letters to you to post here. She will never know that I am not with you, and I am bent on being Mrs. Lamotte's governess if Mrs. Lamotte will have me. So don't try to stop me."

Mrs. Winter and Amy at length ceased to oppose the wishes of their guest, and Mrs. Lamotte's answer to Lucille's letter having been favorable, she found herself a week later on her way to Queenstown. A carriage drawn by a pair of handsome bays was in waiting for her at the station, and she was driven rapidly toward Wildwood Park.

So anxious was Mrs. Lamotte to see whether the homeliness of her new governess was as pronounced as she wished it to be that she came herself to the hall door when the carriage arrived, and after one glance into Lucille's face gave her a cordial greeting and led the way to a handsome parlor.

"Do you admire my home?" she asked when Lucille had divested herself of her traveling wraps.

"I think it beautiful," said Lucille heartily, "and it shows to advantage in this fresh springtime, with the green grass springing up everywhere and the trees putting forth their young leaves and buds."

"You are enthusiastic," said Mrs. Lamotte, "and I feel sure I shall like you. Draw your chair nearer, and I will tell you in confidence why I advertised for a homely governess."

Lucille, who had called herself Miss Danvers (her middle name), did as Mrs. Lamotte requested, and that lady began:

"I am a widow, as of course you perceive by my mourning. My poor Arthur died five years ago, and left me this estate and a comfortable income. My only brother is a bachelor, and spends his winters in the city, but his summers with me. I expect him here next week. He is wealthy and much sought after, and I have had a terrible time protecting him from the snares set for him by every old maid and young miss in the neighborhood. I had one pretty governess, and I firmly made up my mind that I would never have another. There shall be no more running round the garden moonlight evenings and culling buttonhole bouquets. Do you know, Miss Danvers, I actually caught that sly Miss Garfield in the very act of pinning a rose on my brother's coat! Of course I paid her a month's salary in advance and sent her off. I am obliged to have a governess for my two poor darlings, but it shall never be said that my only brother was sacrificed on my account to one of those sly, deep, pretty governesses. No, I have had enough of them. I suffered from nervous apprehension all the time Miss Garfield was here. Another week the sly thing would have been my brother's wife."

"I don't think I shall trouble his peace of mind," said Lucille languidly, inwardly laughing at Mrs. Lamotte's tribulations. "I am sure we will not wander in the garden and pick roses together."

"Oh, I am sure there is no danger with you," said Mrs. Lamotte.

Several days went quickly by, Lucille being charmed with her new life. She completely won the hearts of her two little pupils, and found both interest and amusement in teaching them. She had now regular duties which she was obliged to fulfill, and found life much more bearable than at Barristown.

One morning when she entered the breakfast room she started back as if she had seen an apparition, for there in an easy chair, his handsome head on his hand, his blue eyes bent on the carpet as if in melancholy dreaming, sat Geoffrey Wayne. He was evidently entirely at home, for, hearing a footstep, he looked up, saw Lucille, and rising from his chair came forward, saying:

"Miss Danvers, I am sure. I arrived very late last night, and saw my sister but a few moments, yet she found time to tell me of you and the love Maud and Willie bear you."

He did not recognize her then. Why should he? She had been in full dress at both places where they had met, and her hair had been dressed with flowers and sprinkled with gold dust. Of course she looked vastly different now in a plain dress of dark muslin and her luxuriant hair in a simple coil. And of course, too, Geoffrey Wayne would never think of finding in his sister's governess the sister of his fiancee, whom he had been told was at Barristown.

Before Lucille could collect her thoughts sufficiently to reply Mrs. Lamotte entered, evidently not at all disturbed at finding her handsome brother and her homely governess together. Lucille saw by the way she joked and laughed at Geoffrey about matrimony and the snares spread for him that she knew nothing of his engagement to Emily.

Mr. Geoffrey Wayne had come to pass the summer with his sister as usual; but to the lady's astonishment he did not enter with his usual zest into her plans for croquet parties and archery matches. Lucille noticed that he was grave almost to melancholy, and when letters came from Emily would go off to the little arbor at the foot of the garden and sit for hours smoking gloomily.

Lucille was sitting alone on the front piazza reading one evening when little Maud came running excitedly to her.

"Oh, Miss Danvers!" she cried, almost out of breath, "come to Uncle Geoffrey. A horrid horse kicked him in the leg, and it is broken. Peter and Sam carried him into the parlor, and Peter has gone after a doctor."

Lucille hardly waited to hear all the child said, for at the first intimation she received that Emily's lover had been hurt she started from her seat and hurried to the parlor.

Geoffrey Wayne was lying on a sofa with his brows contracted by pain, his handsome face white with suffering. Lucille, taking a bottle of cologne from the mantel, drew a chair close to the sofa, and began bathing his head very softly and gently. He did not open his eyes, however, and it was only when his sister came running in wild with excitement that he spoke. Then he begged her to be quiet, and said his accident would not amount to much. But Mrs. Lamotte would not be quieted, and wept and moaned until the doctor's coming sent her from the room. She professed herself utterly unable to nurse her brother.

"I feel like fainting when I go into a darkened room," she said. "My feelings completely overpower me when I see him lying there so white and still. Miss Danvers, help me in this. I know I can trust you. I am sure I am not doing a dangerous thing. You are not pretty and sly like that horrid Miss Garfield, and you are the very one who can read and amuse poor Geoffrey. Promise me you will do so."

Lucille, with a bitter pang at her heart as she thought that Mrs. Lamotte could indeed trust her to pay to Emily's fiancee any little attention he needed.

But Mrs. Lamotte was wrong in thinking it not a dangerous thing to throw these two young people so much together. As Geoffrey felt the touch of the cool, soft hands on his head he learned to admire them. As he listened to the low, sweet voice, which appeared never to weary when reading aloud to him, he learned to love it. As he saw the hundred different efforts Lucille made each day to interest him and render his confinement to one room less dull and irksome, he learned to worship her. He forgot her plain face, and contrasted her character only with that of Emily.

For he no longer loved the girl to whom he had bound himself. He had been infatuated with her marvelous beauty, caught in the coils of her shimmering golden hair and musical laugh, and he believed his infatuation to be love. But when thrown constantly with her whom he had believed as perfect in character as in face he had discovered her mind to be shallow, her one passion to be the leader of society. She was vain, exacting and selfish, and had no real love for the man she had promised to marry. But Geoffrey believed his honor demanded that he should fullfil to the letter the vow he had pledged, and the wedding was to take place in October. He had made no effort to break his fetters, though they had grown so galling. He had thrown aside all prudence, listened not to the voice of reason, and had asked Emily to marry him after an acquaintance of barely six weeks.

The knowledge of Geoffrey's love for her came upon Lucille like a thunder clap. Thinking of him only as her sister's betrothed, she had never imagined that her gentle ministrations to him during his illness had awakened into being the tenderest emotions of his breast. He was nearly well, and was sitting in the twilight one evening when she entered the room, and not perceiving in the gloom a chair directly before her, she stumbled over it and fell to the floor, striking her head with considerable force against a small center table.

With one bound Geoffrey was by her side, and lifting her in his arms he cried:

"My darling! my darling! tell me you are not hurt. Speak to me, Lucille, my dearest, tell me you are not hurt." His voice was hoarse with emotion, and hot kisses fell upon the girl's brow as he pressed her to his breast, forgetting Emily, honor, everything, but that he loved this little governess of his sister's.

"Stop," cried Lucille, when she could speak from amazement and excitement; and she freed herself from his embrace. "How dare you speak so to me, Geoffrey Wayne, when at this moment you are engaged to another?"

"You know of my engagement, then? But it matters not how you have learned of it, for it is true. But as Heaven hears me, I love you only, and wish with all sincerity that my hand could follow my heart."

Lucille staggered back against the wall, and dropped her head in her hands. One instant she stood thus, and in that instant the knowledge came to her that she loved this man who was to be her sister's husband. Oh, what a cruel wrong she had done Emily! She raised her face and looked at Geoffrey through her tears, so haggard, so wild, that he was startled at the change in her countenance, and then fled from the room like a frightened deer.

They did not meet again until the next day, and then both were calm, and avoided being left alone together.

Emily wrote to Lucille, thinking her still at Barristown, urging her to return home to act as bridesmaid at her wedding, but Lucille wrote that she could not, and Emily was forced to be satisfied without any explanation of why it was not possible for her only sister to be with her on an occasion of so much importance.

October in all its red and golden beauty came only too soon for Geoffrey, who would willingly have deferred his wedding had it been possible. But it had been arranged to take place on the 10th of the month, and on the 8th he left Wildwood Park, unaccompanied by any one, for Mrs. Lamotte, much to her grief, could not leave home on account of the illness of her youngest child. And she was a faithful mother, even though a silly woman. She was greatly rejoiced that Geoffrey was to marry so well, and talked of nothing but the wedding from morning till night, until it was almost a relief to Geoffrey when the 8th of the month came, and the day when he could leave the Park.

On the evening of the 10th Lucille went alone to the little arbor at the foot of the garden, and throwing herself upon a seat, leaned her head down on the little rustic table, and gave her mind up to painful thoughts and memories. As she recalled Geoffrey's avowal of love, and pictured the scene in which he was even now indulging, the wedding display and the beauty of the happy bride, her tears fell fast, and sobs shook her slender frame. A tempest of regret was sweeping over her, and she could not, cared not, to stay it.

"Lucille," said a grave, manly voice, "Lucille, my love, my darling, look up, and tell me if you really care so much for me as to weep like this."

Lucille started to her feet, bewildered as she saw that it was Geoffrey who spoke, Geoffrey who stood before her, his face illuminated by love.

"Emily!" she gasped. "Where is Emily?"

"She gave me my freedom, Lucille," was the reply, in a low, almost sad tone. "She cared not that we were to be married this evening. She eloped last night with the Count Lazano, whose aunt died barely four days since, leaving him a handsome fortune."

"Oh, my sister, my sister!" groaned Lucille, covering her face with her hands, and sobbing more violently than before.

"Your sister!" repeated Geoffrey. "You do not mean"——

"I mean that I am not the poor governess you thought me, but Lucille Danvers Barstow."

"What a wonderful tale! quite romantic! But, Lucille, I [illegible] once more to see if you are really before me, that I am not dreaming"——

A sudden crackling in the bushes about the arbor prevented Geoffrey from carrying out his intention, and Mrs. Lamotte, purple with rage, appeared before the lovers.

"A second Miss Garfield!" cried the widow in a shrill voice. "So the homely as well as the pretty governesses inveigle my brother into making love to them. I thought better of you, Miss Danvers; as for you, Geoffrey, I believe you would make love to any girl"——

"Stop, Jannette!" cried Geoffrey, whose indignation had prevented his checking his sister's tirade before. "Stop, Jannette; you do not know of whom you are speaking. Let me explain why Miss Danvers came here and who she is."

He then gave a brief explanation of why Lucille had become a governess, and told her relation to Emily.

Mrs. Lamotte would hardly credit her ears, and almost fainted from surprise. But when Geoffrey had finished his story she no longer upbraided him or opposed his love, but offered her congratulations effusively, "hoping Geoffrey would succeed in getting married the next time he invited her to his wedding."

And he did succeed, for six months later cards were out for the marriage with "the plain Miss Bartow," and this time the bride did not elope.—Boston Traveller.

She Wanted to Know.

A woman wearing a mackintosh and carrying an umbrella stood at the ticket window at the Barclay street ferry the other day. Six men were behind her in line. A boat was due to leave in about two minutes.

"Do boats leave here for Hoboken?" she asked, and the man inside answered, "Yes."

"How long will it be before the next one leaves?"

"About a minute," was the reply.

"Does the boat go straight to Hoboken?" asked the woman.

"Yes," said the ticket seller.

"How long could I wait in Hoboken before there was another boat back?" asked the woman, while the men behind her grew nervous rapidly.

"As long as you please," said the patient ticket seller; "they are going and coming all the time."

"Could I get from Hoboken to Jersey City without coming back here?"

"Yes; street cars run regularly," was the answer.

"Would it be quicker to go by a car or come back and take a ferry to Jersey City?" she asked.

"I don't know," was the answer. Then the ticket seller asked impatiently, "How many?"

"How many what?" said the woman.

"Tickets. How many tickets do you want?" The bell was ringing for the boat to move and the men in line were swearing.

"I don't want any tickets," she said. "My sister lives in Hoboken, and if I thought I had time to go and see her and call on my brother's folks in Jersey City I was going over tomorrow."—New York Times.

The Conductor Knew His Business.

"You know where to leave me," said a lady on a Third street car the other day as the conductor took her fare.

"Yes'm; Columbia street is your street, I believe," he replied.

The lady retired in a brown study, and one of those men who know it all and never gets left, and isn't anybody's fool, took up the attention of the conductor with a long yarn about how street cars should be run and what rapid transit would do for the people, and when the conductor thought of that woman again he was just crossing Willis avenue.

"She'll have me discharged if I tell her," he said to himself, and cold drops of terror stood out on his manly brow.

Once the passenger did look out of the car window, but seeing an unfamiliar part of the city concluded she was still en route to Columbia street.

The car went to the end of the line and returned on its way downtown again.

"C-o-l-u-m-b-i-a!" called the conductor bravely, and the lady gathered up her traps and stepped out on the platform.

"Good gracious, conductor," she began.

"Hurry up, madam," urged the conductor, and after assisting her off he hastily rang the bell and the car started again.

And the astonished woman was heard to remark:

"No wonder the cars go slow; they travel backward."—Detroit Free Press.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

THE COSTLIEST GIFT.

I give you a day of my life—
 Treasure no gold could buy—
For peasant and peer are at one
 When the time comes to die;
And all that the monarch has,
 His koh-i-noor or his crown,
He would give for one more day
 Ere he lay his sweet life down.

They are winged, like the viewless wind—
 These days that come and go—
And we count them, and think of the end,
 But the end we cannot know;
The whole world darkens with pain
 When a sunset fades in the west—
* * * I give you a day of my life,
 My uttermost gift and my best.

—Louise Chandler Moulton in Youth's Companion.

The circus had no elephant but the farmers supplied the want by bringing theirs along. C. P. Demers was in town circus day and had in his vest pocket, next to his heart, "an agreement," signed by Crookston's paper railroad builders to build the road through Lambert, Terrebonne and Poplar River. The Com'r is wasting the fragrance of his speech on the desert air when he advocates bonding the county.

Philip Zeh was down from Thief River the first of the week accompanied by his family. We never notice the genial Phil's name in the Press—but Bro Muzzy is a "Prohib," ye know, who wouldn't allow yeast to be set on Saturday night lest it might brew on Sunday. Phil is the opposite—hence the defuculty.

Wm. Porter and Horace La Bree came down from Thief River Monday and Tuesday. Mr. Porter's brother is at work on the Great Northern.

The Poulliot family returned Tuesday from Duluth. They will remain here.

There are some remarkably pretty scenes about town. Photographer Riechel has been taking some the past week.

J. D. Marshall continues to improve his property on 6th st.

Fourth Street is now all fixed up, with crossings at several places.

The frame of the new schoolhouse is up and sends a thrill of pride through every citizen.

Mr. Esterbrook, the dam builder, arrived in town Monday and is now engaged rebuilding the old portion of the North Side Roller Mills dam. When he has done the best dam in the Northwest will be across the river at this point.

J. F. Krost arrived Monday Morning from Hammond, Ind. Mr. Krost will remain a couple of weeks visiting at the residence of H. B. Kaufer. He is much pleased with the country, and may become interested here ere his departure.

To-day the duck season opens. Sportmen are already taking advantage of open season.

Ed. Garceau watches the elements with as much interest as any man—he has a half interest in seventy acres of as fine wheat as ever grew, still standing in the field. Ed expects it to go about 25 bushels to the acre.

The enterprising firm of Johnson and Marshall should be remunerated for the the money expended in grading Kretzschmar avenue. Everyone is surprised at appearance of the street and few expected to see as feasable a route made to the top of the hill leading to the Clearwater dam.

Mrs. Cyprien Gosselin went to Grand Fork to-day to visit her son Pete.

How could the D. & D. run to St. Hilaire and Thief River Falls it it traversed Lambert, Poplar River and Terrebonne? It's a big lalligag—a mysterious misconception of a scheming gang.

Miss M. Simons of St. Paul is a guest of Mrs. J. D. Marshal.

Miss Eugenie Lefreniere is now teaching at Terrebonne. If the Terrebonne schools don't advance it won't be Miss Eugenie's fault.

Grand weather.

Hon. Marcus Johnson is in town this week looking after his interests here and viewing with a certain degree of pride the result of his efforts, the construction of the Great Northern to this city. Mr. Johnson has labored assiduously to induce this road to build in here and to him, as assisted by Mr. Marshall, is due all the credit.

The surveyors have completed the cross-sectioning between here and St. Hilaire. It is expected two hundred men are at work to-day on the new railroad.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Berthiaume, and Mr. and Mrs. Al. Berthiaume, of Gentilly, Mrs. J. Saucier and daughter Stella, of Minneapolis, visited at the Bottineau mansion last week. Mrs. Saucier will return to Minneapolis this week, but Miss Stella will remain several weeks. This week the Bottineau home presented a festive appearance, their hospitable table having accommodated twenty-eight people. Pierre Bottineau presides, and time speeds swiftly while he narrates the thrilling adventures in which he took so prominent a part in the early history of our state, and which will carry his name to posterity.

F. E Hunt has purchased the Borchers saloon building.

Edmund Roux arrived from Canada Monday morning. Mr. Roux is a brother-in-law of Simon Patnode. He intends to locate on a farm here, being accompanied by his family.

Thomas Crompe and family came down from Terrebonne Monday and are now settled in the August Riechel residence. Thomas will handle wheat at the Farmers Mutual elevator.

Miss Lurera Schreiter celebrated the completion of her ninth year on earth, yesterday. Lulu's little friends were all present and spent the day in such a happy way as children do. All sort of games were indulged in, theatrical performances rehearsed in full dress, with long trains. Stories, song, and music helped to kill the time, till the little ones departed for their homes, brim full of happy contentment.

Col. Crooks, superintendent of construction on the Great Northern, arrived yesterday morning.

Our genial wheat buyer, W. T. Spillane, will again 'tend to the patrons of the Hoskins elevator. W. T. is biulding a neat little residence up there, and showing other indications of his his intention of settling down here.

E. A. Moran has his hands full. Any other man might get rattled with the amount of business Ed transacts. He attends to his farms, to his elevator, and besides has three fine horses to worry him.

Fritz Gerke has completed the burning of a kiln of 4,000 brick. Fritz has been working at the thing for some time, and we hope the brick will prove good.

Jas. C. O'Brien fell among us again yesterday but soon vanished quickly from sight as mysteriously as the legends woven by the Ojibway chiefs by their camp fires.

The storm yesterday did very little, if any, damage, in this vicinity. We are approching nearer to that haven of safety, when all the crops will he garnered.

A. Lafromboise was up from Gentilly yesterday just as genial as ever, even though he does have to use a cane to get around with. Mr. Laframboise narrowly escaped being more seriously injured a couple of weeks ago. He was standing in an empty hay rack when the team started to run away; jumping out, he landed with great force on his right leg. The leg was severely strained and the services of a physician were atonce engaged. It is pretty bad to be laid up at this time of year, still a sprin is better then a break and Mr. L. recognizes the fact.

This is the season when canine flesh takes on a phenomenal value. Every red-headed, speckle-faced, long-legged, lop-eared dog that can lay claim to a tinge of good blood is set up as a model of the trainer's skill. Sometimes a deluded mortal, fresh from the cities, rushes onto the scene, and anxious to plunge into the heat of the hunt, stopping not to look up pedigrees or other evidence—asks the price and pays it—what is his consternation then when his dog goes frantic over gopher holes, rushes headlong through a covey or strays far off from his master! Deluded mortals. The repetition of the story does not warn them. We have many good dogs here, and some poor ones. They will all be held at about even figures this year, as there is a great demend for them. Woe to the green purchaser.

Smith & Fralando's Great British shows were with us Saturday and gave two performances, one in the afternoon and one in the evening. The weather being rainy and cloudy prevented country people from coming in early, but by noon the streets were crowded, and shortly after the parade was instituted. The attendance at the shows was very large. Smith & Fralando expressed their determination to visit our city again, with improved facilities for entertaining the public. As it is, they give a very creditable performance, and everybody was well satisfied. The artists employed are all number one. Fisher, the popular contortionist, gave a remarkable exhibition, but he is sadly in need of a severe course of training. The show was free from offensive elements, and will be well patronized should they again come among us.

A. D. Wishard,

RED LAKE FALLS, ma 21f5 Polk Co., Minn.

A Notable Event—Married.

KAUFER—DUFFY—ZEH—KAUFER.—Tuesday, August 18th, 1891, by Rev. Fr. F. L. Arpin, Mr. L. A. Kaufer, to Miss Mollie Duffy, and Mr. Adam Zeh to Miss Gertie Kaufer.

The above event was celebrated at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Kaufer, where the relatives and intimate friends of the contracting parties assembled. The marriage of Mr. Zeh and Miss Kaufer transpired there, at 10:30 a. m. The bridesmaids were Misses Tillie Kaufer and Rosa Zeh; the groomsmen Messrs. L. A. Kaufer, Phil A. Kavfer. These, together with the bride, groom and officiating clergyman, stood beneath a canopy—a parachute of green verdure and flowers, suspended from the centre of the ceiling. A garland of intermingled asparagus and goldenrod hung in graceful semi-circles from this to each corner of the ceiling. The effect was artistic and pleasing in the extreme, while the gorgeous display of flowers in every portion of the room lent dulcet fragrance and sweetness to the scene. The guests surrounded the actors in the solemn drama. The priest having linked together the destinies of Mr. Zeh and Miss Kaufer, and pronounced them man and wife, the happy party drove to St. Mary's church, where Mr. L. A. Kaufer and Miss Mollie Duffy were to be united in marriage. The bridesmaid was Miss Lizzie Boyle, the groomsman Mr. Phil. A. Kaufer. These four occupied positions of honor in front of the altar, and here the knot was tied. Low mass was read by Rev. Arpin, and a few beautiful sentiments expressed. After this ceremony, and congratulations having been passed, all repaired to the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Kaufer, where a bounteous repast awaited them. Entering the dining room, here, too, flowers, sunshine and happiness smiled from every nook, and the beautifully arranged tables were soon surround by a merry throng. Flowers were everywhere, and from 'mid the clustering petals, one might almost have fancied

Love, the proud goddess,
 As smiling on all,
Floating on fragrance;
 And bearing the pall
Of cares and vexations.

The geared cycle of time
Gliding o'er as in rhyme,
Deftly soothing the hearts
Where sly cupid his darts
Had peen planting.

The dinner was pronounced a superb spread. The remainder of the afternoon was spent pleasantly till 6 p. m. when Mr. Zeh and bride took the train for West Superior, their future home. They were attended to the depot by many of their friends; as the train moved in they were showered with a bushel, more or less, of rice and an old shoe was presented. L. A. Kaufer and bride shared in these latter demonstrations, receiving, also an ancient and mysterious looking shoe as a mascot. They will go to housekeeping in the residence portion of L. A. Kaufer's Main st building.

These persons scarcely need any introduction. Mr. Zeh was one of the first settlers in this place. He has always, by grace of his genial, open hearted nature, been a universal favorite, winning the esteem of all who knew him. At present, he is a member of the firm of Jerome & Zeh, who run the leading meat market in West Superior. Miss Kaufer has been a resident of this city for nearly nine years. Accomplished, winsome and lovable, she is indeed a jewel in the matrimonial tie. A favorite wherever she was, 'tis small wonder her departure from our city causes such universal regret. Her noble nature is one calculated to bless a home.

L. A. Kaufer is one of our leading citizens, and very popular with everybody. He is the proprietor of one of the finest saddlery emporiums in the West; occupies several honorable positions of public trust. Miss Duffy is a beautiful, accomplished, naive little lady, with a sweet, captivating disposition, and has made her home with her brother John A. Duffy, our efficient station agent, for the past two yeats.

That happiness and prosperity will fold its white wings over these four young people, is the universal wish of their hosts of friends, and in which the News joins.

Astray Notice.

There came to my premises in the town of Red Lake Falls, section two, on August 2d, one broncho, eight years old, sorrel left rear foot white, on left shoulder "O. T." Owner can secure same by proving property and paying costs and damages.

East Grand Forks News: There has been a great deal of discussion of the bonding question the past week, most good naturedly. Amid all there has been some blowing of chaff about the railrad interest, agents &c. Among the farmers there seems to be a dead set, uncompromising hostility, as far as learned to the proposition, and the city is inclined very much to consider the farmers' interests and its own identical. The proposition and agreement are embodied in the legal proclamation signed by the county auditor, and not by the commissioners, as our sylvan contemporary erroneously assumes Everyvoter should read it carefully and conscientiously, before voting.

THE FARMER FEEDETH ALL.

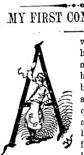
My lord rides through his palace gate,
My lady sweeps along in state,
The sage thinks long on many a thing,
And the maiden muses on marrying;
The ministrel harpeth merrily,
The sailor plows the foaming sea,
The huntsman kills the good red deer,
And the soldier wars without a fear.
But fall to each whate'er befall,
The farmer he must feed them all.

Smith hammereth cheerily the sword,
Priest preacheth pure and holy word,
Dame Alice worketh broidery well,
Clerk Richard tales of love can tell,
The tap-wife sells her foaming beer,
Dan Fisher fisheth in the mere,
And courtiers ruffle, strut and shine,
While pages bring the Gascon wine;
But fall to each whate'er befall,
The farmer he must feed them all.

Man builds his castles fair and high,
Whatever river runneth by,
Great cities rise in every land,
Great churches show the builder's hand,
Great arches, monuments, and towers,
Fair palaces and pleasing bowers,
Great work is done, be't here and there,
And well man worketh everywhere;
But work or rest, whate'er befall,
The farmer he must feed them all.

—Charles Godfrey Leland.

MY FIRST COMMISSION.



A wonderfully handsome woman still; she must have been very beautiful once. I suppose the queer old fellow at her side is her husband. Looks for all the world like Paul Pry."

That was what my nephew said to me, as her carriage turned into the park at the Apsley House corner.

"Beautiful!" I replied; "beautiful doesn't express it she was an angel. She is an angel, a saint, and martyr too. God, how I loved that woman!"

"Oh, of course, uncle," replied my graceless nephew. "Professionally, I suppose?"

You see there isn't so very much difference in our ages, though I am his uncle, and we are more like brothers than uncle and nephew.

"You know you are a very bad lot, uncle," the boy went on. "You go on loving 'em, till you put the last finishing touch, and then you start another canvas and begin to love somebody else. I believe that's the secret to your success as a portrait painter."

My nephew is always saying rude things to me.

"Jack," I said," severely, "my success is due entirely to perseverance, and the fact that I never flatter." And then that imprudent nephew of mine blew out his cheeks, got very red in the face, and very nearly choked himself with laughter.

And then we sat down upon two of the green chairs.

"Tell us about her, boss," said Jack.

I have three pupils, including my nephew: they all smoke short pipes in my presence, and they all three call me "boss."

That's the ccuntess of Wallsend, I began. Fifteen years ago her husband the earl, Paul Pry, as you call him—and you are not the first. Mr. Jack to call him Paul Pry—became a widower, and every right-minded young woman in society duly set her cap at him. At that time I lived off the Tottenham Court Road, and I was madly in love with Lottie Vivian. I was the third floor lodger. I just earned a living then, and no more. It was before I had learned to flatter, Mr. Jack. Her photograph struck me at first. I bought the photo—the photo of Lottie Vivian of the Portico Theatre—and I paid my half crown at the pit door. I saw her in drama, and I saw her in an Easter fairy piece that followed. I saw her dance; I heard her sing; I used to go to the pit of the Portico night after night. I made studies of her as Undine, as Una and as Perdita; and when Mr. Melchizedec, the dealer, offered to buy them, I was rude to Melchizedec, and I declined to part with them upon any terms. One night as I came out of the pit of the Portico I found that it was raining cats and dogs, but money was scarce with me, and I walked home through the rain, because I couldn't afford a cab. Just as I neared my own door, a four wheeler drew up at it, a lady paid the driver, and then she opened the street door with her latch key and disappeared into the house. Great heavens! it was Lottie Vivian herself, and I stood in the rain in open-mouthed astonishment. In a few moments the gas was turned up in the first floor, and then it dawned upon me at once.

I am not a curious man. I knew that an actress lived on the first floor, and that a teacher of languages lived on the second, but I, the third floor lodger, had never troubled my head about them in the least. I had never even asked their names. I went up to my rooms, and flung myself into my easy chair, and I thought of the strange fatality that the woman I admired above all living women should be actually dwelling with me under the same roof, and that we were separated only by a single floor. But though I was in love I had a certain amount of common sense left, and I had remembered that there was a great gulf between Lottie Vivian the popular actress and the painter of pot-boilers on the third floor.

Next morning I dined, as usual, at the Convivial Cannibals. Groper, the low comedian, was a member there. I knew that he had been playing at the Portico for the last ten years. There's nothing comic about Groper in private life; he's the most serious Cannibal I know. His seriousness and his constant complaints about the cookery are his principal characteristics.

We are still Cannibals, Groper, and I, and fast friends. It was from Groper, by dint of pretending that I had never heard all his old stories before, that I ascertained the true history of Lottie Vivian of the Portico Theatre.

"She was a pupil of old Jack Slider's—most of the successful ones have been pupils of Slider's," said Groper, "at some time or other. It's a strange thing," he went on; "she came out at the Portico, and she has had a constant engagement there ever since for the last eight years. She's good all round, that's what she is," said Groper enthusiastically, and then he went on to describe her various triumphs, with which I shall not trouble you. "But though she is a popular favorite at a fashionable theatre, there has never been a word against her," said Groper. "She is as good as gold and as straight as a die, and every farthing she earns goes to her family—to her old father, who was a big man on the Stock Exchange once, mind you," said Groper, "and to a whole family of little brothers and sisters, who are entirely dependent upon her. She is an ambitious girl, too," he added, "and they say she's going to marry Lord Wallsend."

"What! the mad millionaire?" said I.

"That's the man," said Groper.

And then Groper began to abuse the dinner, and I heard no more about Lottie Vivian from him.

I went on paying my half-crown at the Portico, and I got deeper and deeper in love with my fellow-lodger, and my love interfered a good deal with my work. Then it was that I got my first commission to paint a portrait. That portrait made my fortune, and the painting of it nearly broke my heart.

It came about in this way: I got a note one day from Miss Vivian—I have it still—requesting me to call upon her on a little matter of business. I took a good deal of pains with my toilet, and then I went down stairs and knocked at the door of my fellow-lodger.

There was nothing fast about Miss Vivian. She was very quietly dressed, and she came to business at once.

"Mr. Stippler," she said, "you'll excuse my asking you to come here in this informal way but the fact is that I want to have my portrait painted. I can't afford to pay very much for it. Mr. Melchizedec recommended me to you. Can you oblige me in this matter, Mr. Stippler, and," here she blushed violently, "will it be very expensive?"

"Madam," I replied with enthusiasm, "you do me too much honor in selecting me. If you permit me to paint your portrait, it'll cost you just nothing at all."

"Ah!" she answered, with a silvery laugh—don't grin, sir, it was silvery; it wasn't a bit stagey; an innocent, silvery, girlish, delicious little laugh—"that's not business, Mr. Stippler. Besides," she added gently snubbing me, "it was Mr. Melchizedec's selection, and not mine. Let's leave compliments, and come to business. You don't know how sick of compliments I am, Mr. Stippler."

I blushed. I felt like a fool, and I know I looked like one.

"Mr. Melchizedec said something about twenty guineas," said Miss Vivian.

"I shall be only too delighted," I burst in.

"Then we may consider it as settled, Mr. Stippler," said my fellow-lodger. "When shall I sit to you?"

I made an appointment and the thing was done. Of course I expected she would want to be painted in character. Nothing of the kind.

"You see, Mr. Stippler, she said, "I must take you into my confidence. I intend this portrait as a present—as a sort of surprise. I wish to give it to a gentleman whom I am about to marry," and then she blushed and gave a little sigh; and I would have groaned aloud had I dared.

So she sat to me in a little simple deignoir of French muslin—tea gowns weren't invented then—and when I had posed her she said to me:

"Lord Wallsend—that is the name of the gentleman to whom I am engaged, and I tell it to you in confidence, Mr. Stippler—has seen me in Cordelia. He thinks a great deal of my hair. You won't think me vain, Mr. Stippler, if I ask you if I may let it down?"

"Of course I said that it was a capital idea. She pulled out half-a-dozen hairpins, and a great glory of molton gold fell in luxurient waves upon her shoulders.

She gave me twenty sittings for that portrait. I was madly, passionately, desperately in love with her, but I never breathed a word of it. We became great friends, we talked unreservedly to each other just as if we had known each other all our lives—almost as if we had been brother and sister. I suppose it was camaraderie.

Once, and once only, I made an ass of myself.

"It must be finished by the twentieth," she said; "the twenty-first is his birthday."

"I wish it could never be finished," I replied passionately; "I wish I could stand here painting you all my life."

The pretty smile faded from her face, and she pulled me up at once.

"You musn't say anything to me, Mr. Stippler, if you please, that you wouldn't say if Lord Wallsend himself were here by my side."

I apologized; I felt that I was a brute.

We became fast friends. She told me her history, her struggles, her ambitions; and from her own lips I learned that the coming marriage was no union of love or even inclination. She had been driven into it by her parents. There is such a thing as being too dutiful. I learned, too, that Lord Wallsend was next door to an idiot, and that his insanity declared itself in a monstrous jealousy of Lottie, as unfounded as it was absurd.

I had lunched with Miss Vivian; it was my farewell visit to her. The portrait was finished—it was my masterpiece, Jack—and it stood upon an easel in its bright new frame in the middle of the room.

The table had been cleared; thank heaven for that!

"Play to me, Mr. Stippler," she said in a voice that went straight to my heart; "I'm terribly low-spirited. Play something cheerful."

I sat down to the little cottage Erard, and I did as I was bid. I played nigger melodies; I played dance music; and then, somehow or other, I drifted to "Home, Sweet Home," and then I felt so utterly miserable that I broke down. I turned on the stool toward Lottie, and I saw her eyes were full of tears.

"Don't, George, don't," she said; "don't go on. I can't bear it."

She called me by my Christian name for the first and last time.

And then there came a tap at the door, and a hoarse, creaking voice grated out: "May I come in?"

"Good heaven! it's his lordship," cried Lottie Vivian, "and I am ruined!"

But I saved her, though if I hadn't been prompt, she would never have married him, and she might—yes, by Jove!—perhaps have become my wife after all. Stranger things have happened. But I reassured her by a glance, and she took her cue at once.

She was an actress, remember.

I flung off my coat, I whipped out the front board of the piano, I buried my face among the hammers, and I began striking single notes upon the keys.

"Come in," said Miss Vivian, and his lordship entered.

"I hope I don't intrude," he said.

And then I too thought of Paul Pry.

"You are always a welcome guest, Wallsend," said Miss Vivian,

And then they began to chat in whispers.

"Faugh! how the fellow smells of tobacco?" croaked Paul Pry—I mean his lordship.

"Man," he said, addressing me, "you can go"

I put on my coat.

"Where's your hat, man?" said his lordship suspiciously.

"In the 'all sir," I replied carefully dropping the "h."

"I've put it at concert-pitch, miss," I said; "it'll be five shillings, please," and I held out my hand. There was a grateful twinkle in her eyes as she gave me two half crowns. I have them still, those two half crowns.

I went up to my rooms and shaved off my beard and mustache. I have never spoken to Lottie—I mean Lady Wallsend—from that day to this, but she always notices me, and her husband is one of my stanchest patrons.

Lady Wallsend's carriage passed. She bowed politely to me, and off went my hat.

"She's a stunner," said my nephew.

"I hope she is happy," said I, with a sigh.—London World.

How Does Electricity Kill?

An electrician says that just what takes place in the human organism to produce death from an electric currant seems to be an unsolved problem. One of the theories sometimes advanced concerning it is that when a being suffers death from electric shock, it is a pure case of internal rupture or explosion from the generation of gas or vapor. In support of this view the way in which telegraph poles are sometimes torn to pieces in referred to. The lightning follows the moist portion of the pole, which is the core or heart; in this case the moisture is vaporized and an explosion occurs. The high resistance produces heat, the heat in turn steam, and the steam an explosion.—New York Telegram.

Matrimonial Confab.

From the Chicago Tribune.

"That was a very foolish young woman in New York, "observed Mr. Billius, laying his morning paper down for a moment, and renewing the attack on his beefsteak, "that married the wrong man the other day, and blurted out her confession to that effect at the altar. The young man she didn't marry has had a lucky escape."

"Yes, she was foolish to make a fuss at such a time," assented Mrs. Billius, who was staring abstractedly at the wall. "Most women find out soon enough that they have married the wrong man, but they have sense enough to keep still about it. Have some more coffee, John?" she inquired sweetly.

Petroleum Motors Growing Popular.

Petroleum motors are being simplified and improved to such an extent that they may now be ranked among the useful small motors. A number of these little engines have been running for over a year in different parts of Germany and Russia, and in Belgium a company for their construction has been formed. The motors range from one to four horse power.

Is Alum Poisonous,

[Hall's Journal of Health.]

"This question has caused a good deal of discussion. Alum is used by many bakers to whiten their bread, enabling them to use an inferior flour. It is most extensively employed as a cheap substitute for cream of tartar in the manufacture of baking powders. It has not been considered immediately dangerous; although if continued it induces dyspepsia and obstinate constipation. But the fact that many cases of poisoning have occurred from the use of alum, puts the question in a more serious aspect, and prudent people will exercise caution in the selection of baking powders.

"Under what conditions then, does this substance—formerly used only for mechanical or medicinal purposes—become poisonous? They are certainly obscure, and at present we can only surmise what they may be. We suspect that the cause exists in the individual poisoned; some peculiarity of the constitution producing a morbid change in the secretions of the stomach, with which the alum combines and forms an active poison; or the secrections may be healthy but in unusual proportions, and that these less or greater proportions in combination with the alum constitute a poison.

"For example, two parts of mercury and two parts of Chlorine form calomel, which is not poisonous, but change the proportions to one part mercury and two parts of chlorine, and we get corrosive sublimate, which is a deadly poison.

"Then again, we know nothing of the constitutional peculiarities. Why is it that one person can eat all kinds of green fruits and vegetables with impunity, while the same course might cost another individual his life? One person can handle poison ivy and sumac without being in the least affected; another is poisoned if he approaches to within ten feet of them. Out of a family residing in a malarial district, some of the members will suffer half the year with fever and ague, while the others will enjoy excellent health during the entire year. Foods that are wholesome to some persons are actually poisonous to others. This is especially true of some kinds of fish. There is no safety in taking alum into the stomach, as it is shown to be always injurious, and often dangerous." * *

The Scientific American published in a recent number a list of alum and ammonia baking powders, which is of great value at this time. Following is the list complied from official reports. Powders marked with a star seem to have a general sale, as they are mentioned in at least two of the official reports.

Killed In Battle.

"Did you ever think how few people are killed during wars?" asked Thomas Sloane of Boston as he sat in the Colonnado last evening. "Well, here is a memorandum I made recently regarding deaths in battle since 1856. The entire number killed during these thirty-four years—exclusive of those who died from disease—is about 2,253.000. In the Crimean war 750,000 were killed, the Italian war of 1859 resulted in the slaughter of 45,000; in the American civil war, 800,000; in the Danish war (1864), 3,000; In the Astro-Prussian war, 45,000; in the Franco-German war—France 155,000, Germany 60,000; in the Turko-Russian war, 250,000; the South African wars, 30,000; the Afghan war, 25,000; the Mexican and Cochin-Chinese expedition, 65,000, and the Bulgarian-Servian insurrection, 25,000."—Philadelphia Press.

Not a Sign of Poverty.

From the Cleavland Leader.

The mortgages of the newer states of the West, such as Nebraska, are not a sign of trouble or loss of ground. The country was filled up in the first place by men of little or no capital. They obtained their land from the goverment, and this they mortgaged for the sake of making the soil more productive, sheltering crops, etc. The money raised by pledging the raw prairies of the West was simply invested in substantial improvements worth, as a rule, all they cost. Every such debt paid is the proof of prosperity and of the increased wealth of the community, and as long as the Eastern money-lenders find loans on farm property in Nebraska and other states of the West a safe and profitable investment, the condition of the tillers of the soil cannot be so bad as it has been depicted.

A Terror All Around.

A gentleman who was formerly an officer in the United States navy but who is now in business in this city said to me yesterday: "I have always given Captain McCalla credit for being one of the bravest men in the navy, but in my time even he was one of the severest. I can remember when I was a mere lad seeing him while out in a boat take a boy by the nape of the neck and pitch him overboard for some slight offense, and then row off and leave him. On going back to the ship McCalla reported the same boy to be absent without leave, and ordered that he be punished by five days on bread and water. If you have never gone on bread and water you do not know what it is to a growing boy, and in this case any punishment was unjustifiable."—New York Press.

She Didn't take Orders.

She was a little old woman dressed in black, and having a bundle wrapped up in a gray shawl. She had a seat in the middle of a Grand River avenue car, and as she took out her clay pipe and began feeling for her tobacco the conductor stepped forward and said:

"You mustn't smoke here, ma'am."

"Why not?"

"Against the rules."

"Who made the rules?"

"The company."

"Where's the company?"

"Down at the office."

"Well, I never allow nobody a mile away to tell me when I shall or shall not smoke. I've got wind on my stomach, and when I have it I allus smoke. You kin trot right back to the platform and be ready to jingle the bell when anybody wants to get off."

Needed Legislation.

She had gone away and left her chewing gum stuck on the back of the sofa, and it was perhaps unfortunate that her little brother saw it. It was certainly grotesque of him to dig out its inside, fill up the cavity with red pepper, carefully plug up the hole and put the gum back in its place. It was little short of calamitous that her beau should call just at that moment in the evening when she had put the gum back in her mouth again. He could not understand her demeanor. He does not even yet comprehend why she danced and shrieked and finally ran out of the room. There is no question that the proposed bill providing for the killing of all boys between the ages of eight and thirteen should become a law.—Merchant Traveler.

Her Gown Will Weigh Three Ounces.

About the year 1700 a fair young bride in the village now known as New Haven wore a dainty costume of white. The gown was cut low in the neck and sleeveless. The dress was of light and flimsy texture and weighed but about three ounces. It has been handed down from generation to generation, until it has come into the procession of a Danbury lady. The dress is remarkably well preserved and is extremely valuable, both from its age and the beauty of the embroideries with which it is covered. The design of the trimming is prettily worked in the coarse linen thread so common in those days.—Danbury News.

To Preserve Flowers.

A charming way of preserving flowers is shown by a Boston friend. Take very fine sand, wash it perfectly clean, and when dry sift it through a fine sieve into a pan. When the sand is deep enough to hold the flowers in an upright position, take some more sifted sand and carefully cover them. A spoon is a good thing to take for this, as it fills in every chink and cranny without breaking or bending the leaves. When the pan is filled solidly leave the flowers to dry for several days. It is a good plan to warm the sand in the oven before using it, as the flowers will then dry more thoroughly. In taking the sand off great care must be taken not to break the leaves, as they are now dry and brittle. Pansies preserved in this way will keep their shape and brilliancy of color all winter, and many other flowers can be equally successfully treated—anything, in fact, where the full pressure of the sand comes on both sides of the leaf; other wise they will shrivel. To fill in flowers with cup-like shapes it is better to lay them on the sand and with a small spoon fill in and around each flower. Ferns, when preserved in this way, have a more natural look than when pressed, and the maidenhair fern looks almost as well as when it is freshly gathered.—New York Tribune.

A CHAPTER OF GHOSTS.

SOME VERY ODD OCCURRENCES THAT ARE UNEXPLAINED.

A Boy Lifted Bodily and Carried Some Distance—Medicine Phial's Peculiar Behavior—The Widow and Her Son.

One of the most remarkable instances of supposed ghostly disturbance occurred in the home of Rev, Dr. Phelps, of Stratford, Conn, says the Phila. Press. Upon returning from church one day he found that all the doors of his house, which he had carefully locked on his departure, were wide open and the contents of the rooms on the first floor in the wildest confusion. Nothing had been stolen. In a room in the upper story, however, eight forms were found, each one with an open bible held close to its face. On examination these were found to be bundles of clothes, cunningly and very skilfully arranged to represent living beings. Everything was cleared away and the room locked, but within five minutes the same scene was repeated, although the clothing had been carefully put away.

For seven months the house was disturbed by extraordinary phenomena. The most unearthly noises were heard day and night. Furniture and kitchen utensils were mysteriously moved. Glassware and window panes were broken by unseen hands before the startled inmates, and once the 11-year-old son of the doctor was lifted bodily and carried some distance. The most diligent research discovered nothing, and not until he applied to some spiritualists in Boston did the disturbances cease.

One of the best authenticated instances of ghostly visitation is connected with Dr. Kerner's so-called Seeress of Provost. Dr. Kerner for many years conducted an asylum for the insane at Weinburg, in Southern Germany. There came to him for treatment a Mrs. Hauffe, a lady in delicate health. of great nervous irritability and with a mind which was, to say the least, not too well balanced. Wherever this afflicted woman went, and Dr. Justinus Kerner is authority, she was pursued by a variety of strange noises. Chinaware and glassware, tables and chairs, were mysteriously moved in the presence of witnesses. A medicine phial rose slowly into the air and had to be brought back by one of the bystanders.

Dr. Kerner relates countless mysterious phenomena which occurred in this patient's bed-room. He beheld Mrs. Hauffe's shoe pulled off by invisible hands while she was lying almost inanimate in a trance on her bed. She revealed secrets which, upon writing to utterly unknown persons at a great distance, Dr. Kerner proved to be correctly stated.

There lived in Allegheny City at the breaking out of the rebellion, says the New York Post, a widow by the name of MacDowell. She had one son, John by name, who lived with his mother in a two story frame house on Robinson street. The widow and her son were devotedly attached to each other, and when he came home one night and told her that he had enlisted at one of the recruiting booths on federal street she was inconsolable.

On the afternoon of April 6, 1862, Mrs. MacDowell sat in an easy chair at the second story window of her home. It was the first day she had felt strong enough to leave her bed. It was warm and the sun was shining brightly. As she sat alone with her wan cheek resting against the pillows she heard a heavy step on the narrow stairway. She described the succeeding events to the first neighbor woman who reached her side as follows: "The instant I heard the step I knew it was John. As he reached the head of the stairs I turned towards the door and tried to rise to meet him, but I was too faint, and, besides, there was something in his face that drove all the blood from my heart. He was dressed in his uniform and was carrying a big sword in his hand. He stopped in the middle of the room and I saw under his cap, which was pushed back, a broad bandage stained with blood around his forehead. Suddenly he waved his sword three times, looking backward over his shoulder as he did so. I saw the sword fall from his grasp, but it made no noise on the floor; he reached both hands to me and the fierce expression died out of his eyes as he cried out, 'Oh, mother,' and then, before I could say a word, he was gone."

A week from that day the widow MacDowell was buried in the Hilldale cemetery. On the afternoon of April 6, the day when the aparition of her boy appeared to her in the sick room, he was killed while repulsing a confederate charge, at Pittsburgh Landing. He was struck by a spent ball upon the forehead early in the day, but tying a handkerchief around his forehead he remained in the fight. All the officers in his company had been killed or wounded, and he was leading his company with the sword of a dead confederate in his hand when he was hit and instantly killed by a second bullet. His last utterance as he fell was the pathetic cry: "Oh, mother!"

And What Profits.

Matching the stories of valuable and unappreciated oil paintings sold for a song is one concerning a miraculous transaction in Sevres china. Early in the past century a gentleman presented a reverend friend with two vases as a wedding present. These vases stood for more than forty years on a cabinet in a Somersetshire rectory, without attracting any particular notice, until a sale took place after the owner's death, at which they were bought for 2 guineas by a tradesman in Bath. Within a week they resold for 600 guineas to a Bond street dealer who speedily disposed of them to the late Lord Derby for 4,000 guineas.

She Did It Well.

There is nothing like self-possession in all emergencies. Not long ago a clever woman was dining at a handsome board in an interior city. She had never, as it happened, seen lime juice offered in the course of a meal. When the bottle was handed around, some salad had just been served to her, and without giving the matter any thought she assumed the liquid to be a sauce piquante for the salad and dashed a few drops on her lettuce hearts. In an instant she became aware, by that sort of intuition which is in the air at such times, that she had done something wrong, and when she saw her neighbor adding some of the bottle to his glass of water, she divined at once what her blunder had been. The meal progressed and she finished her salad with apparent relish. Her hostess pressed more upon her, and she accepted a second serving. Then, with a little air of not having everything quite to her liking, she looked up and down the table and signaled the waitress: "The lime juice, please," she said, nonchalantly, and as if salad without lime juice were an uneatable dish. This bit of adroitness at once set her in a niche among the company as an epicure of occult and unquestioned knowledge.—New York Times.

It Should Be Adopted.

Some years ago an inventor thought of the idea of an "order board" to be hung up in the kitchens of private houses. The boards bore columns of the names of articles in the commonest use, with a hole opposite each name and a lot of movable pegs to put in the holes against whatsoever articles the housewives needed to keep up a working supply. The invention may have sold well or it may not, but now the grocers are buying them and distributing them to their customers, because, as one grocer puts it, "they save hours of waiting while women try to think of what they need, as well as the extra trips which used to follow the gradual working of each customer's memory.

Cakes Without Eggs.

Observing housekeepers quickly learn that Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is far superior to other brands in the fact that they never fail to make the finest pastry, and if they wish to be economical they can dispense entirely with eggs and can use a less quantity of butter for shortening purposes. The advantage is not alone in the saving effected but in avoiding the trouble and frequently the great difficulty of securing eggs that are fresh. This is often a serious trouble.

Cakes of various kinds from the informal Griddle Cakes to the stately Bride Cake can be made with Price's Cream Baking Powder, which insures light, sweet and handsome cakes; or when used for Griddle Cakes to be eaten hot enables their production in the shortest space of time, always tender and delicious.

Dr. Price's is the only Baking Powder that contains the white of eggs. None so pure! None so wholesome!

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from Ammonia, Alum, or any other adulterant. In fact, the purity of this ideal powder has never been questioned.

What the Balloon has Done.

The proportion of balloon accidents to successful descents has, on the whole, been smaller than should have been anticipated. Blanchard, the first to take up ballooning as a vocation, died in his bed in 1809, after having made sixty-six ascents without accident. Many ascents have been made in the cause of science, and the names of Green, who made over 1400 ascents; of John Wise, who made the distance from St. Louis, Mo., to Jefferson County, N. Y., 1200 miles, in twenty hours; of Gay Lussac and Biot, who in 1804 made a most valuable series of meteorological and physical observations at the height of 19,000 feet; of Glaisher, who rose to 37,000 feet with the aeronaut Coxwell; and especially, recently, of the brothers Tissandier—all these are familiar to every one.

In 1794, the balloon was used for military purposes by Gen. Jourdan, who secured continual observation of the Australian movements, and thus gained the battle of Fleury. The French are also reported to have used the same method in the battle of Solferino. A balloon corps was organized by Gen. McClellan at the outbreak of our own Civil War, 1861; and the use of balloons was one of the regular means of obtaining information of the movements of the enemy. During the seige of Paris, the balloon became the only means of sending despatches out of the beleagured city, and proved to be very reliable. Of all the balloons sent out from Paris, over sixty in number, but three were lost; and they probably simply because they were despatched at night, to avoid the risk from the fire of the enemy, which, as the event proved, was far less dangerous than darkness. Every government probably now has a balloon corps.—Prof. R. H. Thurston in the Forum.

Sleeping in Cold Rooms.

From the German.

It has been said that Queen Victoria sleeps in unheated rooms, and that in frosty weather she has the windows of all her living rooms open, so that guests visiting Windsor must be chilly.

This has called attention to the memoirs of Caroline Pichler, which tell that the Empress Maria Theresa possessed a similar peculiarity. The mother of Caroline Pichler before her marriage was reader to Maria Theresa, and she also assisted the Empress with her toilet. She relates the following:

"The Empress being a large, stoutly-built woman, warmth was not agreeable to her. She did not allow her apartments to be warmed. She had no fear of draughts; she did not know what rheumatism was. In wintertime the window was often open beside her writing table and wind would blow the snow in on the paper from which I was reading to her.

"The Empress went to see a procession on Corpus Christi Day. It took place under the hot sun in Vienna, and she returned to Schœbrum overheated. She threw off her outer garments and sat with a dressing mantel around her in the middle of her dressing room, of which the windows and opposite doors were open to cause a draught. Then the Empress drank lemonade and ate iced strawberries, and while doing so, in order to lose no time, she had her beautiful long hair brushed.

"Service to the Empress was often very painful during the winter, as one had to work with cold hands and the body would shake with the cold, while the Empress did not seem to feel anything of it."

New Clothes in Six Hours.

From the New York Journal,

"Do you know how quickly a man can get an outfit in New York?" said a man about town yesterday. "I mean his outside apparel—that is, a suit of clothes, a hat and pair of shoes. Within six hours a man can order these things, have them made and have them on."

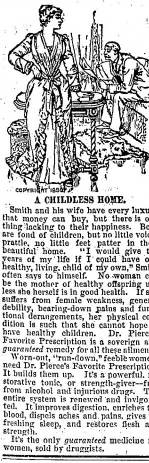
It was a rather remarkable statement, yet it is borne out by fact.

A man can order a complete suit of clothes and in five hours they will be finished. The cutting requires something less than an hour. An expert trousers-maker turns out a pair of pantaloons in one hour and thirty minutes. A vest can be made in about the the same time. The coat is the most difficult part of the suit to make, and it requires three men about four hours to complete it.

As a rule, in this lightning manufacture of clothing, two men or more work upon the same garment. Of course, the linings, straps, etc., are all prepared, and there are a dozen little tricks to save time. For instance, the buttons of the trousers are pasted instead of sewed. There are at least a dozen tailors in New York, who will make a suit of clothes and deliver it within six hours after it is ordered.

A Platonic Guide.

I have lots of fun with bridal couples who climb the dome. Nearly every day I go to the other side of the immense arched painting, which is a perfect whisper gallery, and hear them spooning. When they get too affectionate I turn my back, look up at the painting and say: "This is no place for love making." My voice goes over them in sepulchral tones, and they take away with them a vivid assurance of ghostly watchers in the dome.—Washington Letter.



A CHILDLESS HOME.

Smith and his wife have every luxury that money can buy, but there is one thing lacking to their happiness. Both are fond of children, but no little voices prattle, no little feet patter in their beautiful home. "I would give ten years of my life if I could have one healthy, living, child of my own," Smith often says to himself. No woman can be the mother of healthy offspring unless she herself is in good health. If she suffers from female weakness, general debility, bearing-down pains and functional derangements, her physical condition is such that she cannot hope to have healthy children. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a soverign and guaranteed remedy for all these ailments.

Worn-out, "run-down," feeble women, need Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It builds them up. It's a powerful, restorative tonic, or strength-giver—free from alcohol and injurious drugs. The entire system is renewed and invigorated. It improves digestion, enriches the blood, dispels aches and pains, gives refreshing sleep, and restores flesh and strength.

Wanted His Rights.

Some years ago a wealthy manufacturer in the West, employing nearly a thousand hands, established a "model" city, thus giving the workmen and their families many comforts and luxuries that they could not have attained unaided. Of course there were regulations to govern the model city, which as a rule was cheerfully observed.

There were fault-finders, however, and especially a new-comer, named Bascomb. Among the rules was one forbidding the burning of soft coal, on account of the odor and smoke, and Bascomb objected strongly.

"My goodness!" remonstrated a friend, "I don't see what you are growling about. We get hard coal at cost, and as one ton goes as far as two of the other, you aint out of pocket."

"'Taint right to forbid it," asserted Bascomb.

"See here," demanded his friend, do you really want to burn the nasty stuff?"

"No, I don't wanter," replied Bascomb, "but I wanter have the right in case I wanter!"

In His Foreleg.

In the hurry of writing, laughable blunders will inevitably occur. Thus an editor of The Companion found in a piece of his own copy, the other day, a sentence about a man who was wearing a knew hat."

The New York Tribune tells a story of a correspondent who described an accident by which a man was injured "in his right foreleg." The editor who read the copy did not notice the expression, and the compositor set it up as if it were an every-day occurrence to meet four-legged men.

The ever-watchful proof-reader was equal to the emergency, however, and came into the room with a broad grin on his face to ask if the injured man could probably be secured for a dime museum.

Artifice will, for a time, conceal the most glaring errors. Superficial adornments are rarely tangible.

Her Name Is Dennis.

A singular character residing near Irasburg, Vt., says the Philadelphia Times, is said to have allowed no human being to look upon her during the day for nearly forty years. She goes by the name of Ann Dennis, and is said to have been the daughter of a well-to-do farmer, and that she lost her mind, or at any rate took up her present singular mode of life, after the death of her mother, whom she accidentally killed by an overdose of some opiate. She lives in a small, substantial one-room cabin about six miles from the town, remains tightly shut up during the day, and ventures out only on the darkest nights, when she will walk into town and transact such business as she may have, but cannot be induced to enter a room lighted up save very dimly, and then only when thickly veiled.

As she has some little money left her by her father, the tradesmen all humor this singularity of hers, though several attempts have been made to get her to show herself in the light, but however well planned the strategy it has never succeeded. She converses intelligently enough when she wants to, and many deny that her mind is at all affected beyond a little harmless eccentricity. Those who remember her in her youth say that she was an unusually pretty, attractive girl, and well educated. She lives quite alone, with nothing living to keep her company.

For a crabbed temper, bad blood and irritability take Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters. All genuine bear the signature of J. P. Allen, Druggist, St. Paul, Minn.

S. S. S., is the only permanent cure for contagious blood Taint. Old chronic cases that physicians declare incurable are cured in every instance where S. S. S., has had a fair trial.

I honestly believe that S. S. S. saved my life. I was afflicted with the very worst type of contagious blood poison and was almost a solid sore from head to foot. The physicians declared my case hopeless. I quit everything else and commenced taking S. S. S. After taking a few bottles I was cured sound and well.

WE are making a specialty this season of what we call our PARAGON HARNESS. Made of the FINEST STOCK and the very BEST WORKMANSHIP. Such a harness cannot be bought for less than $25. at retail. But we are willing, in order to introduce it, to SELL ONE SET ONLY to one person as a sample for $16.50.

$25.00 HARNESS FOR $16.50

IN GENUINE RUBBER $18.50.

DESCRIPTION OF HARNESS.

A fine Buggy Harness stitched twelve stitches to the inch, except traces which are stitched ten. Is made to represent a $30 harness. It has a 3 or 3 1-4 hand laced, leather pad saddle, with covered seat and jockeys; is made from fine stock. Bridle is of usual dimensions, has fine blinds, nice leather front and beautiful rosettes with glass centers, nice nickel bit. Check-rein, either overdraw with nose piece, or side check. Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strap, breeching and girt folds are made either of patent enamel or plain harness breeching leather as preferred and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased, give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Box loops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

YOU WANT

a San Francisco paper and of course you want a good one. The WEEKLY EXAMINER fills the want completely, for it is the best. It gives you every week not only all the news, but the best literary and miscellaneous matter published on the American continent—that is its specialty; being the best. It wants your subscription—yours particularly—and offers not only to you, but to every other subscriber, one or more attractive premiums.

In the first place, it gives every subscriber, one of the four magnificent etchings or paintings described below, and delivers it safely at his address, postage paid.

"The Retreat from Moscow," by Meissonier,
"The Roman Chariot Race," by A. Wagner.

Each of these pictures is 21x28 inches, and they are elegantly reproduced in fac simile, showing every tint and color of the great originals, either one of which could not be purchased for $100,000.

"Women and Children First," by C. Napier Hemy,
"Christ Leaving the Prætorium," by Gustave Doré.

Each of these pictures is reproduced in photogravure, size 21x28, and eminently fitted for framing, and will adorn the walls of the most refined house.

Each subscriber has the choice of any one of these four pictures, which will be mailed him in a tube direct from the EXAMINER office, as soon as the subscription is received.

In the second place, it will give 5,000 premiums, valued in the aggregate at about $125,000 to its subscribers this year. If there are 50,000 subscribers, one in ten will get one of these premiums; if there are 100,000, only one in twenty. But no matter how many there are, each and every one of these premiums—which range in value from 50 cents to $6,000—will be given absolutely without cost to some of those who have paid $1.50 for the WEEKLY EXAMINER for one year. The EXAMINER is thoroughly responsible, as you know, or as Wells, Fargo & Co. or any bank or commercial agency in San Francisco will assure you, and the leading men of the city will see that its premiums are distributed exactly as agreed and that every subscriber no matter where he is located, will receive just what is assigned to him.

Of course you want your home paper also, and you can just as well as not save a little money by taking the EXAMINER with it. The price of the WEEKLY EXAMINER is $1.50 per year, including the premium picture and your share of the $125,000 list of premiums, which are fully described in the twelve page Premium Supplement, which will be sent free on application to

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C. St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

Now, Is It a Bluff?

It Certainly Does Not Look Much That Way at the Present Writing—The Great Northern Being Built Into Red Lake Falls as Rapidly as Possible.

Realestate Increasing in Value—Sales Numerous and Many Inquiries.

The Great Northern is not running cars into Red Lake Falls yet, but it the present energy is maintained it is safe to say such will be the case before many weeks have elapsed. Work has been commenced on both ends of the line—here and at St. Hilaire. Contracts have been let the past week and before many days dirt will be flying thick and fast.

Has Jim Hill fooled us?

It does not look much that way now, but it does look as if he has fooled a great many other people who thought this move merely a bluff to defeat the D. & D. bonding scheme.

There is something in it for Jim Hill and he is not the man to let his opportunities slip.

Red Lake Falls is to-day the liveliest town in this part of the state. Realestate has advanced 33⅓ per cent. the past couple of weeks and sales have been many. Red Lake Falls is to-day on the fair road to become the leading city in the Northwest.

It is scarcely necessary for us to recount our advantages.

We have information that as many as half a dozen large milling institutions are interested in Red Lake Falls and will be upon the scene in due season. Red Lake Falls has more capitalists interested in her property than many a town tenfold her size. The aggregated wealth runs up into the millions. All these forces are quietly working to one end—our future greatness.

Already the tonic of life has been imbued.

The Great Northern is coming.

Look out for the cars!

Musicale.

Miss Minnie Zaiser will give her musicale Wednesday evening next at Opera hall. Every lover of music should turn out and give Miss Zaiser a rousing benefit. But for her the musical talent of Red Lake Falls would be slumbering. An interesting program has been prepared, the numbers of which are as follows:

1. Come Where the Lilies Bloom ....Quartette.
2. Eight Flower girls ....Class
3. The Blacksmith........Maria Lavik
4. Pleasant Social ....Carrie Pirath
5. Black Hawk Waltz Bennie Perron

The art gallery of the Minneapolis Exposition which opens August 26th, will be more attractive than usual this year. In addition to a superb collection of paintings of Western scenery, the management has succeeded in securing the great "Wetherell" collection of relics of the Cliff Dwellers of Colorado. These relics number some thousands of articles that were in everyday use by these curious people. Besides these there are a large number of curios which were secured among the Navajo and other Indian tribes.

WOMAN'S WORLD IN PARAGRAPHS.

A New York Girl Who Ought to Have a Testimonial.

Her name was Kate Chrishausen, and she was walking along the street with a little satchel in her hand. The rest of it was that Miss Chrishausen was cashier for a business house and that the satchel contained several hundred dollars that she was on her way to deposit in the bank. Though she held such a responsible place, Miss Kate was only seventeen. A thief who had watched her leave the office followed her. Nothing would be easier than to snatch the satchel from her slim girl hand and run with it. So he snatched. But Kate had a stronger grip than he bargained for, and she was fully conscious every moment of the value of what she carried. She held on all the harder to the bag and screamed. The fellow rubbed her knuckles just as the boys do when they want to make one of their mates let go of anything, but even that failed. Then he tried to push her over with no better success, the girl screaming bloody murder all the while. Then the thief suddenly concluded it was about time for him to "sneak," and started to run. But by that time a brave and chivalrous milkman had been drawn to the spot. He jumped from his cart, grabbed the thief and held him till the police came and took him. He was a regular old timer. Thank heaven women are beginning to learn athletics. I glory in that girl.

The new Episcopal bishop, Phillips Brooks, is grandly liberal on the woman question and goes in for woman suffrage. But does he still put that barbarous old word "obey" into the service when he joins a couple in holy matrimony?

A statistician of society matters finds that women enjoy dancing, while men do not. In England there are twenty-five women who dance to one man who does so. The experts ought now to find some peculiarity in the anatomical structure of the sexes to account for this.

Mrs. Lida Bacon, a court stenographer in Cincinnati, has been assigned to a most important duty. She has been appointed master and referee in the case against the Mutual Fire Insurance company of that city. She received this appointment from the supreme court, by which she was instructed to take testimony and have the company show cause why it should not be dissolved. Little by little even lawyers and judges are finding out what women are capable of intellectually.

The young women who take the severe four years' course at the English universities have exceptionally good health throughout.

When Miss Jordan sought to enter the law school at Yale college the trustees found there was no bylaw of the institution to prevent it, so they let her in because they could not help it. She graduated with her class. But just as quick as they could the Yale corporation made a bylaw that no member of the forbidden sex should ever again get in there by hook or crook, and so the law stands. The young ladies, of course, can go elsewhere for a university education, but this is very tough on Yale.

Some things that have happened under my observation lately prompt me to ask, Do piety and corsets go together?

Listen to what Rev. Anna Shaw says about the last Methodist general conference: "Several hundred men spent five days in putting five women out (a woman a day, you see) and decided to keep the women quiet by establishing an order of deaconesses, in which women might work for nothing and board themselves; and then, leaving for the time all great matters of church and doctrine, this body of men spent a day in devising a dress for the deaconesses to wear."

Twenty-two of the Kansas newspapers are edited by women, and the Chicago Tribune thinks that is what is the matter with Kansas.

Bishop Coxe thinks it is really dreadful that women should ride bicycles, and compares them to a witch on a broomstick. But if the good bishop should happen to see some of the hundreds of stenographers, typewriter girls and clerks of Washington and Brooklyn, young women who toil at desks all day, out for a spin on the fascinating wheel, their eyes bright, their cheeks softly pink with the exercise, their lungs and limbs growing stronger and fuller every day, their whole bodies more ready to resist disease and weakness, he would never say a word against bicycle riding for women again. Any exercise, no matter what it is, that draws women outdoors and keeps them there several hours a day ought to be welcomed by everybody, ministers included. If ministers will do their flocks and their country real good, let them encourage by every means at their command girls and women to take outdoor exercise.

An estate of $55,000 in England is left to Mrs. Laura Fulton, of Atchison, Kan., on condition that she marry some good man and live with him a year. But Mrs. Fulton says that she will not marry even to get the fortune. What an experience she must have had? Most women, even widows, are willing enough to marry without any fortune at all. If, however, the present feeling against marriage continues to increase among women, the time will come when it will require all manner of bribes to induce them to enter the married state.

Ha! Ha! Ha!

Red Lake Falls People are at Present Indulging in a Hearty Laugh.

There are Several Things Which Tickle us—Pretty Nearly On Top.

That is the Only Position That Agrees With Us—We Are In It.

Red Lake Falls has seen the bonding scheme creep into its hole, with a great amount of satisfaction. There could be but one course for Red Lake Falls to pursue in the matter, and her position was speedily indorsed by the whole of Eastern Polk county. She has witnessed other schemes fail in whose success a deep interest centered, and which would have been a visible benefit to the majority of Polk county's inhabitants. The very men who were instrumental in the defeat of county division last winter, now are given a taste of their own medicine. The united influence of our citizens was brought to bear against the scheme, and it was felt.

Red Lake Falls is happy over the result of harvest. The farmers will, many of them, this year see themselves free of debt, and local enterprises will flourish.

The prospects for the speedy opening of the Red Lake reservation grow brighter day by day. Few people fully realize the enormity of the wealth that is in the Red Lake pine—few sections in the world have as great a backing as this. The gold beds of California cannot compare with it.

We have every reason to be satisfied, and a discontented man in town to-day is a freak.

The Reservation.

WASHINGTON, Aug 19.—D. S. Hall, chairman of the Chippewa Indian commission, has received his final instructions and started for home to-night.

Special stress is laid upon the importance of removing the Mille Lacs band of Chippewa Indians to White Earth, though the commission under Mr. Rice, the former chairman, used up most of the appropriation, leaving Mr. Hall with much to do and very little money to use. The instructions as to who will be enrolled leaves the matter entirely with the commission. It is to act as the judge in the premises. Mr. Hall is advised to look after the cutting of pine on the reservation and give his views as to the advisability of cutting dead and down timber generally. The departments are of the opinion that allowing dead and down timber to be cut is an incentive to bring the pine forests on the reservation in that condition by starting fires and thus killing the timber. Forty thousand dollars has been set aside for continuing the survey on the Red Lake reservation, and the surveyor general will let the contracts at once. The appraisal of the four townships already subdivided on White Earth will begin at once and the work pushed on to Red Lake as soon as the report of completed surveys are reported to the general land office and reported by the commissioner. The allotment of land by the commission will soon begin at White Earth. The Mille Lacs and other bands entitled to reservoir damages are informed that they cannot have their cash until they have settled on the White Earth reservation or taken. Then they will get their share in money. The probability is that the headquarters of the commission will be at Detroit, which is the nearest railroad station station to White Earth. Mr. Hall required explicit instructions in relation to some matters which were given, though much is left to the judgment of the commission.

The Resources of New Zealand.

Emigrants have gone to New Zealand for the last half century because they were told that they could make a living by farming or keeping sheep, by cottage husbandry, coal or gold mining, or other forms of labor. They have not been disappointed. The resources of the colony are as varied as its scenery, and partly for the same reason. It extends 1,200 miles from the cold south bordering on antarctic seas to the warm north, and thus has every kind of pleasant climate, through all the ranges of temperate and subtropical.

When the native of another country sees its unequaled capabilities for tillage and pasturage his instinctive patriotism makes him almost thankful that it is not any bigger, like the French marshal, whose comment on the British infantry, "the best in the world, sire, but luckily few in number," is so often repeated in England.

If New Zealand were as large as Australia it would supply the English market, and Canada and the United States could hardly be expected to be grateful. Its average yield of wheat is twenty-six bushels to the acre. It is better adapted for raising the best kinds of wool and mutton than even New South Wales, which truthfully boasts of having more sheep per capita than any other country under the sun: but then its runs and paddocks are not so vast, or so capable of indefinite expansion.

The amount of business done by its handful of people—less than two-thirds of a million—is astonishing. For the last few years the exports averaged sixty dollars per head, and for the year ending June 30, 1889, they had increased about eight millions over the previous year. The imports are nearly as large. No wonder that its ports are crowded with shipping.—G. M. Grant, in Harper's.

Parliamentary Headgear in South Africa.

The "high black hat" has turned up as a controversial subject where one would least expect to hear of it—in the volksraad reports. One of the rules of order, it seems, was that members of the house "shall be dressed in black, with a white tie and high black silk hat." Several members were in favor of regulation evening dress, but the silk hat was very much opposed, one honorable gentleman declaring that he had never seen one! Another member sententiously observed that "clothes were not provocative of sense nor of looking after the public interest." Moreover, it was urged that this compulsory dress was "a violation of republican spirit."

We should think so, indeed! Where is the freedom of a republic in which one must observe sumptuary laws? General Smit, however, made a very bold assertion. He declared that these things were done since the days of the Bible, which if true, gives an antiquity to the most hideous headgear civilized man ever suffered under—greater than Europeans imagined it possessed. Five motions were eventually brought in to expunge the high black hat, and another to throw out the rule altogether; but eventually the article was carried with the silk hat struck out. We trust the dignity of the volksraad will not suffer in consequence.—Whitehall Review.

How Do Eels Breed?

It may fairly be said that the eel, as to its breeding, is the most mysterious animal in existence. Its method of propagation has puzzled science for centuries and has been a subject of more or less superstitious speculation among many peoples for thousands of years. The ancient Egyptians had their own theories respecting the matter. Some authorities have contended that eels grew up from horse hairs, which in some strange manner became vitalized. Others have held that they were generated spontaneously from slime, while others still have gravely advanced the belief that they came from the skins of old eels, or even from similar exuviæ of water snakes.

That eels mate with water snakes is very generally accepted as truth. Most popular among people who get their living from the water, however, is the theory that eels are the progeny of various other fishes. The Sardinian fishermen assert that they are produced by a certain kind of water beetle, which for this reason is called "mother of eels." The Greek poets, who fathered all children otherwise unaccounted for upon Jupiter, declared that this god was the progenitor of the eel.—New York Sun.

A Clever Dog.

An engineer employed on the works of the Yverdon and Simplon railway has a little terrier. As he was going away for some time he asked a friend at Yverdon to take charge of his dog. Bijou knew the lady well, and was apparently quite happy and comfortable, but in about a week he disappeared. Mlle. J—— naturally was much distressed, when, to her great relief, she received a letter from Lausanne from M. R——'s mother, saying: "Bijou is with us; he appeared on Monday."

He remained at Lausanne a few days and then returned to Yverdon by train. This he repeated several times, always getting out at the right stations, staying with Mme. R—— occasionally three days. Needless to say, all the officials on the line knew him well. Whether he imagined he would find his master at his mother's house, or whether, like all the rest of the world, he wanted a change, as he could not tell us, I cannot say.—Cor. London Spectator.

Enormous Weight of Side Branches.

Look at the enormous weight of some of the lateral branches. On Rabbit lane, near Germantown, near the residence of Mr. E. S. Miller, are some grand old white oak trees. Some of these have side branches extending horizontally clear across the highway, possibly to fifty feet from the trunk. They must weigh many a hundred pounds. Years ago, when these branches were but a few pounds' weight, even a boy climbing along would have caused them to split from the trunk, and even now a few pounds at the extremity would cause some curving. But when it is left to the growth power alone it can preserve its exact horizontal direction, and for all its enormous weight retains complete adhesion to the trunk. The man who thought if he had a lever long enough he could lift the world would never find it long enough if it had to grow out of the earth as the branch from a tree.—Thomas Meehan in Philadelphia Ledger.

WING TEE WEE.

Wing Tee Wee
Was a sweet Chinee
And she lived in the town of Tac,
And her eyes were blue,
And her curling cue
Hung dangling down her back;
And she fell in love with gay Win Sil,
And he wrote his love on a laundry bill.

And O Tin Told
Was a pirate bold,
And he sailed in a Chinese junk;
And he loved, ah, me!
Sweet Wing Tee Wee,
But his valiant heart had sunk;
So he downed his blues in fickle fizz,
And vowed the maid would yet be his

So bold Tin Told
Showed all his gold
To the maid in the town of Tac,
And sweet Wing Wee
Eloped to sea
And never more came back,
For in far Chinee the maids are fair,
And the maids are false as everywhere.

—Harvard Lampoon.

MY OFFER.

AN offer of marriage is a delicate thing to indite; but when I had written mine to Miss Marian Lee I felt that it was, take it all in all, a very tolerable composition.

It was a warm day, and I had no particular fancy for the long walk to the postoffice, and just then I heard my sister Augusta call to the nursery maid, whom she always addressed as "Bobbins," though of course she had some baptismal name of her own.

"Take these invitations to the postoffice, Bobbins," she said. "If you hurry you'll catch the last mail."

I was not anxious that my sister should see the address on the letter and comment on it, and I waited until she returned to the house, and then slipped out of the library and called Jack.

"Jack," said I, "run after Bobbins and give her this letter."

Jack snatched it and obeyed me. I saw him hand the letter to Bobbins. I saw her turn and look at me. Even at that distance the sly look in her flat blue eyes struck me, and I saw her put it carefully in her pocket and walk on.

My heart began to beat furiously. I had done the deed—I had cast the die.

All I could do was to wait. I did wait. A day passed—two, three—and still no reply. Under ordinary circumstances I should have called; but with that letter pending of course that was impossible.

I endeavored to possess my soul with patience. Being so occupied with my own thoughts it was some time before I noticed that Bobbins was behaving herself in a very peculiar way.

At last one evening, as I sat upon the porch in the twilight smoking a cigar and wondering when I should get a reply to my letter, Bobbins fluttered out in a miraculously fluted cap and apron, and sidled into the corner behind me.

"It's Master Jack's hat as he left hout 'ere," she explained. But, though she found the hat she still remained in the corner.

I moved my chair that she might pass more easily, but this was not evidently what she wanted, for in a moment a small pink claw rested on my shoulder, and the voice of its owner said: "Oh, Mr. Reginald, 'ow 'appy I ham, to be sure!"

"I'm very glad to hear it, Bobbins," said I.

"And don't you think, sir," said she, "that, when a young person has not the pen of a steady writer, hanswers by word of mouth is far more satisfactory to them as it is in love and waiting for them anxious like?"

I knew that Bobbins had a sweetheart, who did something athletic in a sugar warehouse and was spoken of by the other servants with admiration on account of his size, but I had not expected to receive her confidence in the matter. Was it possible that she discerned in me that fellow-feeling which makes us all akin? At all events I could answer her as one who knew.

"Yes, Bobbins," said I; "never intrust to the postman what you can do with your own tongue."

"And if you think so, sir," said Bobbins, "the difficulty of want of a hearly heducation is hovercome, and I kin reply werbatum, as I heard my master say the other day, and my reply is this: 'Hif you loves me as I loves you no knife can cut our 'arts in two.'"

"Both sensible and poetical, Bobbins," said I.

"Oh, what a love you are!" said Bobbins, patting me on the cheek.

Bobbins was an absurd little creature; but she was a girl and I was a young man. It seemed to me that moment the proper thing to kiss Bobbins, and I did it. At that moment the voice of my beloved nephew Jack sounded behind me.

"Where is my hat?" it squealed.

And Bobbins fled, with much show of trepidation, while I dusted my lips, contact with Bobbins' cheek having proved to them that she was not behind her betters in the use of violet powder.

That evening Jack distinguished himself by making a statement that "Uncle Reggy had a mash on Bobbins;" for which vulgarity, I am glad to say, he was promptly sent to bed, explaining between his sobs, however, that "he saw him kiss her."

My sister was very grave with me that evening; but Bobbins was so curiously prim and so positively plain, and my opinion of her appeared so thoroughly established, that I was not long under suspicion, and having escaped this time I was determined not to allow Bobbins to place me in a false position again. And this was why, when I saw her the next day "niggling' up the garden path in a more than usually affected fashion, I hid behind the carriage-house.

She had just parted from her athletic sweetheart, and he was coming toward the gate in what seemed to be a rather unpleasant state of mind. However, that was nothing to me, and I came from my retirement in an unconcerned fashion, whistling, and expected that Bobbin's young man would be sensible enough to steer himself out of the way. However, he did not. He came straight on, his fists doubled, his brow bent, his lower jaw protruding, and our toes met, and my eyes on a level with his scarf-pin—a small golden hogshead. Then he stood still, and, as it was my intention that he should "turn to the right, as the laws directs," and not I, I stood still also.

"What do you mean by this here?" said he, in low and awful tones. "Come now—I want to know."

"What has happened to you, my good man?" I asked in as sarcastic and exasperating a manner as I could assume.

"Do you know who I am?" asked he.

"I have understood that your reason for being about the premises now and then was Bobbins," I said.

"Ho!" said he. "And ain't there nothin' sayerid in your 'ristycritic heyes? Han't a poor man's young lady has much 'it own as a swell's is?"

"Rather more generally," said I.

And then the honest look in the wrathful giant's eyes touched me. I was a lover also, and knew the pangs that doubt of his chosen fair may make a man endure.

"Come," said I, "I can not pretend to misunderstand you. You are talking about my sister's maid—Bobbins. Has somebody told you that I——"

I paused; I scarcely knew how to express myself.

"She's that uplifted," said the giant, his under lip quivering, "as I don't know her. She was willing enough to have me six months ago; but, now that you hoffers 'er the opportunity of rising habove her station, her hairs are horful. 'Owever, if she takes you, she takes you spiled as to beauty—hof that I warns you."

"My good friend," said I, "I'm not afraid of you; but I assure you that I don't want Bobbins to take me. I've not made love to her; she is quite mistaken. Nothin could induce me to marry her, and I have no wish to beguile her into impropriety. Now you mention it, I remember that her manner did indicate some such suspicion. She's an idiot to dream of such a thing."

The giant's face relaxed.

"Hif it's all her vanity, and you swear to it, I don't care a snap of my finger-tip habout it!" said he. "Hi'll play the same game hon'er, and she'll be glad to summon me back when she finds out her folly."

"No doubt," said I.

"And she'll 'ave to summons," said the giant. "I an't goin' beggin' myself. Women folks is allers up to somethin' 'igh or low. Don't you find it so yourself, sir?"

"I do," said I.

"No hoffense, then," said he.

I nodded, and we parted.

Bobbins was certainly a very imaginative young wonan, but I was warned, and therefore armed against her.

When I met her I looked over her head; when she threw herself in my way I walked the other. I wore a doleful countenance, I imagine, for my letter to Marian had never been answered, and I had decided that this was her gentle way of declining my offer, and certainly felt as miserable as I looked, However, I could not escape my fate.

One morning when my sister had taken Jack, Robby, and their maid out for a ride, I sat in the library writing some business letters when the door opened softly and a little old woman entered the room. She carried a large and bulgy blue umbrella in one hand and a palm-leaf fan and an immense pocket-handkerchief in the other. She courtesied to me, waving the fan and hankerchief as she did so, shut the door, and advanced toward me.

"There is always eavesdroppers in a great 'ouse like this," she said, "and what I 'ave to say is conferdenshul. If I am not mistooken you har Mr. Regynuld Thompson."

"That's my name," said I.

"Ho!" said she placing her umbrella in an upright position against my desk and seating herself in an arm-chair. "Very well, sir. When I tell you that I ham Missus Bobbins—Miss Bobbins' mar—you will hunderstand why I am here."

"Not in the least, madam," said I. "I should have supposed that relationship would lead you to the nursery, not to the library."

Mrs. Bobbins waved her handkerchief. "My darter told me you was as 'ard as a stone. No matter; she 'as a parent as will see her righted. Air you trifling with my darter's affections or air you not?"

"Certainly not," said I. "I have explained to her sweetheart that I don't want to cut him out, and it's all right."

"Oh," said Mrs. Bobbins; "Jim is hat the bottom of it, is 'e?"

"No doubt," said I. "I am not, at all events."

"Ho!" said Mrs. Bobbins. "Ho! You are a willin', then? You air trifling with 'er young' art? 'Appily the law hoffers hus redress. She has proofs against you, sir; and she will go into a court of justice, sir, and constitute a case of breach of promise, and win damages, and publish you, sir, to the hull world for what you air."

"I never saw or heard anything quite so abominable as this," said I; "never."

"My lawyer—for I 'ave one—shall call on you before the sun sets tomorrer," said Mrs. Bobbins. "You shall rue the day that you trifled with a poor but honest gurl. Hi leave you to your conscience."

She waved her fan and handkerchief at me, caught up her umberella, and departed.

"What a fool I was to kiss that girl!" said I. "And what an idiot she must be."

That evening my sister and my sister's husband followed me to the library with such an evident intention of seeing me that my heart sank in my bosom. They closed the door and seated themselves before me, and Augusta began the attack.

"Reggy," she said, what does this all mean? You haven't really fallen in love with Bobbins? You don't want to marry her? What would ma say, and aunt Pellico, and brother William? O Reggy, say it is not so!"

"Why the deuce should I want to marry that little fright?" said I. "Have I given you reason to fancy my taste so poor? A girl who never opens her month without making a ludicrous mistake, too, and your children's nursery maid! Marry her, indeed!"

"I am relieved," said Augusta. "But still you have done very wrong. You have made love to her; you have led her to believe your intentions were honorable. She was confided to my care by a widowed mother, with excellent references from a London clergyman, and I am responsible for her safety to a certain degree, and she assures me that you made a solemn offer of your heart and hand to her, and, after leading her to bestow caresses upon you, jilted her."

"Very wrong, Reggy—very wrong!" added my brother-in-law.

"Shocking, you know—shocking!"

"At all events, it is a lie. Your respectable young woman is a blackmailer of the worst sort," said I.

"She has proof, Reginald," said my brother-in-law.

"Ah!" said I. "Ring for her, and let us see what she has to say."

"It's too cruel!" said Augusta. "She has a heart, if she is poor."

But I had rung the bell and requested the girl who answered to send Bobbins to the library.

"Well, Bobbins," I said, facing her as she entered. "It appears that you have circulated the report that I asked you to marry me. What do you expect to gain by such a monstrous falsehood?"

"Indeed, mum," said Bobbins, addressing my sister, "I can prove the fact. I was engaged to be married, hindeed I was, hand it's broke off on account 'is doings. Hi never would have thought hit, being brought up to keep my place, but for 'is words and deeds; and 'ere it is, mum, hin black and white, as plain as your prayer-book, hand 'is name at the hend, which you may read it for yourself."

She took a note from her pocket as she spoke and offered it to my sister.

"This is your writing, Reginald," she said.

I dashed forward and gazed upon the missive. It was the offer of marriage I had written to Miss Marian Lee nearly a month before—the one I had sent to the postoffice by Bobbins.

"What are you doing with this?" asked I. "It is an offer of marriage—I admit it. You have all read it, but it is intended for some one else. I have been waiting for an answer to it ever since I gave it to you to take to the postoffice. This is a pretty trick indeed!"

Bobbins looked at me solemnly.

"It was the day you sent your invitations to the lawn party, Augusta," I said. "I told Jack to give the note to Bobbins to post. She has kept and opened it and taken advantage of its contents. A note addressed to Miss Marian Lee was——"

"No, I beg pardon, sir!" said Bobbins, who was now a pale shrimp from chin to crown, "hit was not addressed to nobody. Master Jack honly said: 'Here's a letter has Uncle Reginald says hi'm to give to you;' hand 'aving no haddress, I thought it was to me."

"Is your name Marian?" I asked.

"No, sir," said Bobbins, "but hit is Mary Hann, and I thought 'Marian, my hangel,' was your poetical and romantic way of writing in a hoffer of your 'and and 'art. 'Ere's the envelope, blank."

This was the explanation; in my agitation I had forgotten to direct my love-letter.

My sister's sympathy was all for Bobbins. I wasted none on any one but myself. How I had suffered that weary month!

That very evening I made my offer verbally—as all offers should be made—and Bobbins long ago married her discarded giant, and, even condescended to receive a wedding present at my hands.—Homo Queen.

IS IT ON THE LIST.

Ammonia and Alum in Baking Powders. How to Detect Them.

In view of what the Minnesota Senate has done, it is hoped that legislative bodies in other states will soon take up the subject of food adulteration. The subjoined list of baking powders containing ammonia and alum, compiled from official reports and published in a recent number of the Scientific American, is given below. "It deals in a direct manner with an evil which must be cut down" said the Chicago Tribune in commenting on the Scientific American report. Following is the list of

AMMONIA AND ALUM BAKING POWDERS.

COMPILED FROM OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Powders marked with a star seem to have a general sale, as they are mentioned in at least two of the reports.

*ATLANTIC & PACIFIC.	*ROYAL.
COOK'S FAVORITE.	SCIOTO.
CROWN.	SILVER SPOON.
CRYSTAL.	SILVER STAR.
DAISY.	*SNOWDRIFT.
*DAVIS' O. K.	SOVEREIGN.
DRY YEAST.	STAR.
GEM.	STATE.
GLOBE.	STANDARD.
*KENTON.	SUNFLOWER.
PEARSON'S.	WASHINGTON.
PERFECTION.	WINDSOR.
PEERLESS.	ZIPP'S GRAPE.
PURITY.	CRYSTAL.

There are, in addition to the foregoing list from the Scientific American, a number of such powders sold in the western that were not found in the eastern stores.

Following is the list to date:

CALUMET, - - -	Contains Alum. (Calumet Baking Powder Co., Chicago.)
FOREST CITY,	Contains Ammonia Alum. (Vouwie Bros., Cleveland.)
CHICAGO YEAST.	Contains Ammonia Alum. (Chapman & Smith Co., Chicago.)
BON BON -	Contains Ammonia Alum.
HOTEL, - - - -	Contains Alum. (J. C. Grant Baking Powder Co., Chicago.)
UNRIVALED, - - -	Contains Alum. (Spragues, Warner & Griswold, Chicago.)
ONE SPOON, TAYLOR'S,	Ammonia Alum (Taylor Mfg. Co., St. Louis.)

HERCULES, - -	Contains Ammonia. (Hercules Baking P'w'd Co., San Francisco)
CLIMAX, - - -	Contains Ammonia. (Climax Baking Powder Co., Indianapolis)

Ammonia and alum are the most common adulterants used in the manufacture of baking powders. The Government report shows that a large percentage of the baking powders on the market contain either one or the other, or both these pernicious drugs.

What woman would use an ammonia or alum baking powder, if she knew it? Such powders not only undermine the health, but ammonia gives to the complexion a sallow or blotched appearance. The presence of ammonia or alum in a baking powder, however, can easily be detected.

To Detect Ammonia.—Mix one heaping teaspoonful of baking powder with one teaspoonful of water in a tin cup; boil thoroughly for a few moments, stir to prevent burning, and if ammonia is present you can smell it in the rising steam. Or, place a can of the suspected powder top down on a hot stove for a minute or two, then take off the cover and smell.

To Detect Alum.—Alum powder can be tested by putting a couple of teaspoonfulls of the powder in a glass of cold water. If no effervescence, that is bubbling or simmering, takes place, condemn the powder and return it at once.

Some alum powders, however, like the "Calumet," "Bon Bon," "Chicago Yeast," etc., contain phosphates in combination with alum, and with these brands the following test is simple and sure:

Take one half teaspoonful of baking powder in lid of say half pound can; char thoroughly over a strong alcohol flame, a good gas jet, or red hot coals. After charing, that is, burning until the whole mass is black, add a teaspoonful of water and place a bright piece of silver coin in the solution. Stir for one minute, then take out the silver. If the powder prove a cream of tartar powder the coin will be bright; if an alum powder it will have sulphur stains.

Now pour a little vinegar into the lid and smell the fumes. Alum powders give off sulphuretted hydrogen, which may be detected by its foul odor.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from Ammonia, Alum, Lime or any other adulterant. In fact, the purity of this ideal powder has never been questioned.

It has been observed that advice is not disliked because it is advice, but because so few people know how to give it. Yet there are people who are vain enough to hate it in proportion to its very agreeableness.

HAZING AT WEST POINT.

Not Done Away With, But It Is Not So Rough as It Was.

"Has the practice of hazing been done away with?" asked a reporter for the Louisville Courier-Journal of John S. Sewell a West Point graduate.

"Not altogether, but it is not quite as rough as it used to be. They used to toss the plebs in blankets, drag them by the heels up and down the street, roll them down the embankments of the fort into the ditch, and all that, but that has been pretty well stopped. Now, it is usual, when one of the cadets want to go to see his girl, and his gun must be cleaned, he dosen't want to do it himself, so he takes his traps to a pleb, and politely requests him to put them in good order—and the pleb usually does it."

"But suppose he doesn't?"

"Why, then he gets the worst of it. Sometimes he is made to sit on the sharp end of a bayonet or treated to a dose of the setting-up exercises behind the tent. Or they make him chew the end of a rope or the canvas of a stretcher until they get tired. Sometimes they fasten a brass button to a string, pass the string over a ridge-pole of the tent, and make the pleb stand, with his hands at his side, and endeavor to touch it with his nose. When he tries to get it away up they let it drop, and when he sees it dangling low and reaches for it they yank it up high. When a pleb first gets there he is usually very green. If he is from the country he will probably eat with his knife, use his own spoon to take sugar, or his own knife for the butter. They begin to abuse him with a volley of curses that almost takes his breath, and when they have gotten through with that they tell him how he must eat. This, however, usually results in good. No, they keep up hazing. I have been dragged out of my tent many a night when tired after a hard day's work. Yes, I suppose the cadet officers could stop it, but they wont, and the regular officers might do it if they would patrol the company grounds all night. But hazing is not what it once was."

GHOSTLY WARNINGS.

Superstitions of Some Famous British Families.

Two giant owls perch upon the battlements of Wardour Castle when the last hour of an Arundel of Wardour has come. If a Devonshire Oxenham is about to die a white-breasted bird flutters over the doomed one's head. The Middletons, of Yorkshire, as becomes an ancient Roman Catholic house, have a Benedictine nun to warn them of an approaching death. A weeping, mourning spirit warns the Stanley's of a reduction in their number. A hairy-armed girl, called May Mullach, brings the like sad news to the Grants of Grant. The Bodach am-dun, or Ghost of the Hill performs the office for the Grants of Rothiemurcus.

The death of an Earl of Airlie is foretold by the beating of an invisible drum. So respectable a man as Dr. Norman McLeod, editor of Good Words, lent the weight of his testimony to it. In 1849 Lord Airlie died in London, and the household at Cortachy Castle, his seat in Forfarshire, were thus prepared for the news, and when his son died in Colorado the ghostly drummer boy was heard just before his death, Lady Airlie heard it in her room and was greatly prostrated, but one of the servants first heard it in a corridor. The approaching death of a Bruce is announced by the specter of a woman in white, who appears to the doomed scion of that ancient and once royal house.—Notes and Queries.

Never neglect your fire-places. Much of the cheerfulness of life depends upon them. What makes a fire so pleasant, is that it is a live thing in a dead room.

SYRUP of FIGS

Don't be a spider and crawl in these days! Why not keep up with the nineteenth century? You would not buy a steam engine made like those of a century ago. Then why should you buy the old-fashioned, big, drastic pills that gripe and debilitate your system?

As great improvements have been made in pills as in steam engines. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets are tiny, sugar-coated granules, or pills, are easiest to take, and never gripe or shock the system.

They are purely vegetable and perfectly harmless.

One little Pellet's a laxative, three to four are cathartic. They regulate and cleanse the liver, stomach and bowels — quickly, but thoroughly. They're the cheapest pill, sold by druggists, because you only pay for the good you get. They're guaranteed to give satisfaction, every time, or your money is returned. That's the peculiar plan all Dr. Pierce's medicines are sold on.

Can you ask more?

SICK HEADACHE

CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS.

PORTLAND, OREGON,

The Great Western Railway Terminus!

The Great Pacific Seaport City!

Real Estate is the Basis of all Wealth.

AN INVESTMENT THAT WILL NET.

20% to 30%

99 per cent. of those investing in Real Estate make money, 87 per cent. of those investing in Business lose money.

A commercial center is the safest place to invest in real estate, especially when such place is a great railway center; has good river transportation and large foreign and domestic shipping. Portland is that place.

Portland, Oregon, is now pre-eminently the commercial center of the Pacific Northwest. No other city in the United States is so well situated in respect to natural resources as is Portland, and it leads all other cities west of the Mississippi River in its phenomenal growth in population. Located at the confluence of two great rivers, and being the terminus of more transcontinental railways than any other city in the United States. In fact, every advantage which insures the solid growth and prosperity of a city is abundantly enjoyed by Portland.

THE TAWOOD REAL ESTATE COMPANY
PORTLAND, OREGON,

Has the best plan for investors yet devised. You never read anything more explicit and simple. It is absolutely safe, and cannot fail to be profitable to all who invest.

CAPITAL $300,000. 6,000 SHARES AT $50 EACH.

SHARES FOR SALE AT PAR VALUE, $50.00 PER SHARE, FULL PAID NON-ASSESSABLE.

We will not sell a share of stock at less than par value ($50 per share), as the Company's capital stock is not inflated or watered, but every dollar of its capital is backed by Solid Real Estate investment.

A FAIR OFFER.

If you own stock, and at any time wish to surrender it, this company will take its own stock at $1.40 on the dollar and pay you in Real Estate at the price at which the company is selling lots to other parties.

Write for Prospectus giving full explanation of the company's plan and all information regarding how stock is paid for, &c.

HALF A CHANCE MEN.

Some of Our Famous People Got a Poor Start in Life.

How many men have succeeded in life to whom not a single circumstance was kind? asks the Detroit Free Press. How often we hear people say of some worthless fellow: "Ah, well, he never had half a chance." But there are plenty of boys who have come to the front in life's battle who never had even a quarter of a chance.

Take Thomas Ball, the sculptor, for instance. He was but 12 years old when his father died. The poor widow —Thomas' mother, young herself and far from strong, had five young children. There was no more school for Thomas after his father's death. He must go to work and help to support the rest. He got a place in a grocery store where they gave him $1 a week.

Not much that—but what a difference it made to the poor little family!

From the time he was 12 young Ball had always to work for the others, until they were all grown up.

He had little instruction, even in his art, and he never had that little until after he had earned the money to pay for it. But—he succeeded.

Then there was that other sculptor, Hiram Powers. Hiram was the eighth of nine children, and he was a very small boy when his father died; and like Ball, he had to go to work for the family. He had been born in Vermont, but his parents had moved out to Ohio in that way poor people have of roaming hither and yon after better luck.

It was in Ohio that the father died and in Ohio that Hiram fought his youthful battle. For seven years he had charge of the wax figures in a Cincinnati museum and it was while there that he felt an impulse toward his future art and tried his prentice hand at modeling in clay.

But it was not until he was 30 years old that he was permitted to strike out for himself, and he was 32 before he had money enough to go to Italy. Yet he was to be the sculptor of the Greek Slave.

Peter Cooper, who founded the Cooper institute, had a still greater struggle, because, as a boy, his health was the frailest. He went to school but one year of his life, and during that year he could only go every other day. But when he was 5 years old he was earning his living by pulling hair from the skins of rabbits his father shot to make hat pulp.

He had not "half a chance." It seemed almost literally that he had no chance at all. He went to New York when he was 17 years old to make his fortune. He walked the streets for days before he got a place, and then apprenticed himself to a carriage maker for five years for his board and $2 a month.

He had neither time nor money for what people call pleasures—but he had the pleasure of hope. While he was working for 50 cents a week he said to himself: "If I ever get rich I will build a place where the poor boys and girls of New York may have an education free"—and he did it.

William Hunt, the painter, used to say: "Don't talk of what you want to do—do it!"

A NEW LIZARD.

One That Until Recently Escaped Scientific Observation.

The reptile house at the zoological gardens, says the Gatherer, now contains two lizards of species never before exhibited. One—Simony's lizard (Lacerta Simonyi)—is especially interesting as confirming a tradition that had long existed as to the occurrence of large lizards on the island of Ferro or the rocks lying off the east end of the island. More than 400 years ago, when the chaplains of Messire Johan de Bethencourt wrote their account of their subjugation of the Canaries to the power of Spain, they spoke of lizards in Ferro "as large as cats, but harmless, although very hideous to look at." Their story was considered a mere "traveller's tale" till Fritsch visited the island in 1862-3, and was asked by the people if he had seen such animals, which they called "chameleons." But naturalists knew nothing of them till very recently, when they were scientifically described from specimens preserved in spirits and sent to Europe. Some little time since, Canon Tristram visited the island and brought away some specimens from the rocks of Zalmo, at its eastern extremity, which are only accessible in fine weather, and when the water is smooth. The animal measures about eighteen inches, of which the tapering tale is nearly one-half; the general color on the upper surface is dark brownish gray with two rows of round yellowish green spots on each side; the under surface is yellowish or greenish blue. Great interest attaches to this animal, which has so long escaped scientific observers, and which has a habitat so different from other members of the order. The people of Ferro say that these lizards live on crabs, but although these were provided in plenty, the specimen in the gardens refused to touch them, and appears to thrive on a mixed diet of raw fish and meat, with a few grapes and pieces of banana.

ONLY A SPIDER.

Yet It Brought Ruin and Defeat to the Dutch Nation.

When the French quartermaster, Disjonval, was confined in prison by the Dutch at Utrecht he sought to beguile the tedium of his prison life by attentively studying the habits of the spiders which frequented his cell, and eight years of imprisonment gave him leisure to be well versed in their ways. In December of 1794 the French army, on whose victory over the Dutch depended Disjonval's restoration to liberty, were in Holland, and the victory seemed certain if the frost, which was then of unprecedented severity, continued.

The Dutch envoys had failed to negotiate a peace, and Holland was despairing when the frost suddenly broke. The Dutch were now exulting, and the French generals prepared to retreat; but the spiders of Disjonval's cell forewarned him that the thaw would be of short duration, and he knew that his little insect weather monitor never deceived him. Accordingly he contrived to communicate his weather knowledge to the army of his countryman, and its generals, who duly estimated his (Disjonval's) character, relied upon his assurance that within a few days the waters would again be frozen so as to be passable to the French troops. They delayed their retreat; within twelve days a sharp freeze set in, and the French army triumphed. Disjonval was released, and a spider had brought ruin to the Dutch nation.—St. Louis Republic.

NEW COLORING IN GERMANY.

Manufacturers Say that It Becomes Fixed Without Fire.

Some of the German porcelain and glass manufacturers are now using a new coloring material, capable of being "fixed" without fire. In carrying out this process, ordinary water colors are used, these being rubbed down with a certain mixture, consisting of two solutions, compounded in definite proportions, one of them being composed of one hundred parts of a syrup of potassium water glass to which has been added ten parts of a lead acetate solution—fifteen parts lead acetate to one hundred parts of water—and stirred by an air stream until well mixed; the other solution is a mixture of fifty parts of borax dissolved in one hundred parts of warm water and twenty parts of glycerine. Sixty parts of the first described solution are mixed with forty parts of the second, and with this mixture the colors are rubbed down. For thinning purposes water and the first named solution are mixed well together in equal parts. After the products have been painted they are placed in a bath composed as follows. One part of borax is dissolved in twelve parts of water and mixed in a gutta percha vessel with fifty parts of hydrofluoric and ten parts of sulphuric acid. On the immersion of the articles some ten minutes in this bath they are washed in clean water, and the color appears as if burnt in.

Pastry Without Butter.

Light, flaky and digestible pie crust and all kinds of fine pastry can be made with Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder without butter or with one half the usual portion, if preferred, or with a small quantity of lard or other shortening as desired. Pie crust made in this way is more wholesome and digestible besides being more economical and easier prepared in addition to saving all the butter if desired. One-third the flour is also dispensed with, and the crust is rolled that much thinner, the raising qualities of Dr. Price's Powder swelling it to the requisite thickness. Those who enjoy the appetizing qualities of the delicious home made pie will rejoice to know this secret.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is the only powder that contains the white of eggs.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from Ammonia, Alum, or any other adulterant. In fact, the purity of this ideal powder has never been questioned.

Judge Gresham's Caller.

Indianapolis News.

The conventionality in Judge Gresham's court frequently results in some amusing situations. The other day the judge was in his room in the Federal building, hearing an argument by A. C. Harris, in an important case when the door opened and in walked a countryman from Harrison county, Judge Gresham's old home. The visitor was a well-preserved specimen of an independent farmer. His face, unshaven, was round and chubby he wore a broad, white hat; he was without collar and his clothing and shoes showed yellow clay. He spit some "amber" when inside the door then, without noticing Attorney Harris, or the other occupants of the room, stalked up to Judge Gresham with:

"Well, how air you jedge? How's all the folks? I was in town on a little business, and I knew the folks down home would like to hear from you, so I came up to see you a little while."

Attorney Harris halted at a period in his argument when, with both arms outstretched, he was about to clinch a point; he looked at the intruder a moment, who had not removed his hat, and then beckoned to Deputy Marshal Conway to have the man take off his hat.

Judge Gresham apparently did not notice the embarrassment of attorneys and spectators. He rose from his chair, took the visitor by his hand, called him by his given name, asked him about all his family, also calling them by name, and said he was glad he had come in. He chatted pleasantly with the old gentleman for several minutes, asking about many Harrison county people, and seemed to enjoy the call. All this time the attorneys and the deputy marshal were bewildered. The latter half feared it was his duty to prevent such an interruption of court, but he hesitated about moving. The former stood talking with the judge as freely as he would have conversed with his nearest neighbor over a rail fence, and when he was ready to go, he said: "Well, good luck to you, jedge; come down and see us." And he walked out as independently as he had come in. The judge resumed hearing the case as if nothing had happened.

Misery Me!

From the Atlantic Constitution.

One of the queerest boycotts on record is that of twelve men in Tennessee Valley, Rabun County, by their moonshine neighbors.

There is plenty of whisky in Rabun—enough, so tradition goes, for thirty or forty counties as large as Rabun—and amongst these rough, but generous-hearted neighbors a jug of it can be had for the asking.

There are twenty men there, though, that can't beg or buy one drop of it.

If they ever get any they get it outside of Rabun County.

The boycott was brought about in this way. Several months ago these twelve men signed a petition asking that the distilleries in Rabun County be broken up, reciting a number of casualities due to whisky, and parading the distilleries as a heinous, pernicious, immoral factor.

It was all done very quietly, and not one of the twelve expected to hear of it again.

Somehow or other their neighbors heard of it. It was proved up on them, and the boycott was instituted in revenge.

No violence was done. It was the general understanding that the twelve men were to be dealt with as of old, except that upon no terms were they to be furnished with whisky. The compact had been adhered to religiously.

The boycotted men go to the social gatherings and to church, and are treated kindly. But when the whisky is passed around they must watch it drunk in silence, or they must leave. They gamble with the others, tell stories, swap mules, interchange neighborly courtesies—but no whisky.

They can't buy it. They can't beg it. They are afraid to make it, for they would be watched and informed upon by their neighbors.

The singular boycott shows no signs of weakening. The twelve men have professed repentance, sworn allegiance, done everything that the most exacting or cautious could demand of them, but the boycott is still on.

The Late Empress Augusta's Tact.

Theodore S. Fay in The Philadelphia Times.

At another time I figured in a way not calculated to increase my reputation as a diplomat. Royal persons deem it a duty to address, as far as possible, every one in the circle. Her Royal Highness one evening entered into conversation with me. Among other things she said she was very fond of reading, but sometimes had difficulty in getting interesting books. With the innocent experience of an American, I replied: "Why your Royal Highness's palace adjoins the Royal Library." I had sense enough to perceive that I had made a mistake, but, as Macbeth says retreating is worse than going ahead. I finished the sentence as I had first intended: "And there are the 500,000 volumes on its shelves." In a German this speech would not have been very leniently judged. But, with tact and grace, she answered very kindly: "That is true, but we sometimes want new books." I think she was rather pleased with my simplicity.

The custom of burial in a sitting posture prevails among the inhabitants of Canara and Telinga, in India; as also among some of the Marattas. Bodies belonging to the "Stone Age" have been found buried in this singular posture. Some of the tribes of North America also adopted this mode of burial.

To be idle and to be poor have always been reproaches; and, therefore, every man endeavors with the utmost care to hide his poverty from others, and idleness from himself.

Read not books alone; but men; and chiefly be careful to read thyself.

"German Syrup"

G. Gloger, Druggist, Watertown, Wis. This is the opinion of a man who keeps a drug store, sells all medicines, comes in direct contact with the patients and their families, and knows better than anyone else how remedies sell, and what true merit they have. He hears of all the failures and successes, and can therefore judge: "I know of no medicine for Coughs, Sore Throat, or Hoarseness that had done such effective work in my family as Boschee's German Syrup. Last winter a lady called at my store, who was suffering from a very severe cold. She could hardly talk, and I told her about German Syrup and that a few doses would give relief; but she had no confidence in patent medicines. I told her to take a bottle, and if the results were not satisfactory I would make no charge for it. A few days after she called and paid for it, saying that she would never be without it in future as a few doses had given her relief." ⓞ

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

THE NEWS last year printed several columns of matter instructing the farmers about smudges as preventative of frost. This year the other papers had it.

Now that the engineers who lately surveyed the Red Lake river will report favorably it remains for Congressman Halverson to get an appropriation for the improvement of this stream. No doubt the congressmen from the golden Fifth will pull with the democrats and if so he can, no doubt, get a tavorable recommendation for an appropriation from the committee on rivers and harbors. Get in your work, Kittle, and the people of the whole North will rise up and call you blessed.

A sheet headed "Anti Monopoly Supplement" was handed to us by a farmer friend. This sheet, the offspring of the Business Men's Union, looks like a Dakota device for roping in shekels through advertising. We are however glad that the NEWS received so much advertising through the columns of this sheet which it is alleged was sent to every farmer in Polk county. We are thankful to the men who got it up (the back) that they advertised this paper so extensively.

In the line of mechanical noveltiies, the Minneapolis Exposition opening on August 29th, promises an unusually interesting display. An attractive folder sent by tha management gives a very good list of the attractions of that character. Among them we note an envelope machine, a wood carving machine, flax scutching machinery, a full line of dairy machinery, and a number of other attractive specialties of like design. As usual excellent music has been assured, the organization known as the 8th Nexican Cavalry having been contracted with.

Chairman Knsen of grasshopper fame tackles the village council of Red Lake Falls and accuses it of appropriating $1,000 for county division purposes. How this concerns the officious Mike needs explanation. He is no doubt angry that the village council should do such a thing without having first given him the chance to second the motion. He also accuses this same council of having appropriated $200 to be used in defeating the railroad bonds." From what we have read of Mike, he of mileage fame, we concluded he was a great parliamentariac, but he develops other qualities when reporting for his harlot sheet, the Crookston Times, that throws his seconding of motions far in the shade. We have reference to his proclivities for lieing. This village council never appropriated a dollar to fight the bonds. He also accuses the council of giving the NEWS the village printing at full legal rates when another Red Lake Falls paper offered to do the work at less than one third that amount. The facts in the case are as follows: The village printing was given to Phil. A. Kaufer as the records show, his being the only bid. No other person had a bid for printing before the village council. The records in in the office of the village recorder show very clearly who got the printing and how he got it. It shows still further that the president of the council had nothing to do with the contract for printing. Mike, however, feels very sore over the defeat of the bond scheme and is willing, in order to cover up his own duplicity, to make any kind of charges against whomsoever he chooses, if he can only get a sheet dirty enough to prostitute itself by printing his lieing accusations. Look up the records, Michael, before you talk.

The New Electoral College.

Here is a table which the whole country will soon begin to study with great interest. It shows the make up by states of the electoral college in 1892. The total membership under the new appropriation is increased from 401 to 444. To be elected president a man must receive 223 votes, a full majority of the total. If no one receives that number, the election is thrown into the ptesent house of representstives:

Grant's - Memoirs.

Original $7,50 Edition, 50 Cents.

50 Cents!

NO book has ever had such a sale in the United States as General Grant's Memoirs. Over 650,000 copies have already gone into the homes of the rich, but the subscription price of $7 has placed it beyond the reach of people in moderate circumstances. If 650,000 people have been willing to pay $7 for Grant's Memoirs, there must be a couple of million people in the United States who want them, and will jump at the opportunity to buy at the low figure here offered.

We will send you General Grant's Memoirs, publisher's original edition, best paper, cloth, green and gold binding, hitherto sold by subscription at $7.00 and absolutely a proposition such as has never been made in the history of book publishing. The two splendid volumes of General Grant's Memoirs, of which 650,000 copies have already been sold—not a cheap edition, but the best—for 50 cents; PROVIDED you send your subscription to the NEWS for one year, and also a subscription of $3 for the Cosmopolitan magazine, the brightest and cheapest of the great illustrated monthlies, itself equal to the best $4 magazine.

The Cosmopolitan is enabled to make this offer because of the purchase of 600,000 volumes at a price which even publishers would deem impossible, and with the idea of running up its circulation to half a million copies. By contract with the Cosmopolitan the NEWS is enabled to offer to its readers a share in the low price obtained through the largest purchase of books ever made in the history of the world.

If, however, you have Grant's books, the Cosmopolitan's offer will permit you to take instead,

Gen, Sherman's Memoirs, 2 vols., sold by subscription for $5 00.

Gen. Sheridan's Memoirs, 2 vols. sold by subscription for $6.00.

Gen. McClelland's Memoirs, sold by subscription for..........$3.75.

All of these are bound in cloth, green and gold, in uniform style with Grant's Memoirs.

The Cosmopolitan and the NEWS are sent postage prepaid, but the postage on the books, at the rate of ½ cent per ounce, must be remitted with the order: Gen. Grants' Memoirs, 96 ounces, 48 cents; Gen. Sheridan's Memoirs, 92 oz.—46 cents; Gen. Sherman's Memoirs 84 oz—42 cents; Gen. McClellan's Memoirs, 48 oz.—24, cents, or books can be sent by express at the expense of the subscriber.

Send at once $3.00 for a year's subscription to the Cosmopolitan, $1.00 for a year's subscription to the NEWS and 50 cents for a set of Memoirs—$4.50 in all—to which add postage on the particular set of Memoirs selected.

If you are not acquainted with the magazine, send a postal card to the Cosmopolitan, Madison Square, New York City, for free sample copy.

If you want a good magazine,
If you take one anyway,
If you want the RED LAKE FALLS NEWS
If you take it anyway,
If you want these Memoirs,
WHY????
Don't you take advantage of this great offer?
Remember, old subscribers can get the benefit
By PAYING UP ONE YEAR IN ADVANCE. You intend to pay us for your paper (no doubt.) This is a good time to do it. Remember the steel engravings and gig. A ticket on these premiums goes with the above offer.

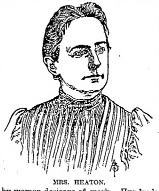
WOMEN AS JOURNALISTS.

SOMETHING THAT WILL INTEREST GIRLS WHO WANT TO WRITE.

If You Have Not Health, Good Sense, a Manlike Indifference to Snubs and Slights, and Indomitable Will, Besides Talent, Don't Think of Trying It.

[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

Thousands of women are ambitious for a journalistic career. Leading newspapers and syndicate editors are besieged by women desirous of work. Hundreds of manuscripts daily solicit editorial consideration. The vagueness, the indirectness with which applications are made, the subject and the treatment of much of the manuscript submitted evince that the majority of aspirants have little or no conception of the cardinal requisites of the journalistic calling.



MRS. HEATON.

The careers of such women journalists as Mrs. Emily V. Battey, the female Nestor of the New York press, twenty years editorial writer on the New York Sun; brilliant Eliza Putnam Heaton; the Bisland sisters; Helen Watterson, the New York Evening Sun's "Woman About Town;" Nellie Bly and Nell Nelson; Mrs. Nichols, of the New Orleans Picayune; Margaret Sullivan, tariff editorial writer of the Chicago Herald; Mrs. Sallie Joy White, of Boston, etc., seem to inspire armies of women, with or without the capacity for writing, with the idea that they, too, can write acceptably. To the right woman, rightly endowed, success in journalism—that is, the ability to earn a livelihood—is but a matter of industry and discretion. What are the essentials of journalistic success? I have talked on this subject with women journalists on both sides of the water and the opinions given are interesting.

"I attribute my success in journalism," said Mrs. Emily Crawford, the famous English journalist, "chiefly to a robust constitution."

Health is certainly an essential. Skill in writing must be seconded by the journalistic sense, "nose for news," the ability to grasp and treat tersely and brightly the gist of public interest. One must also possess an inexhaustible fund of manlike indifference to slights and snubs, and the ability to hold one's tongue. Journalism and domesticity are antagonistic. The true woman journalist can never be the true domestic woman. Something must be sacrificed. The requisite journalistic qualities possessed, however embryonic, scope for development must be sought. There is a prevalent impression that New York is the journalistic emporium. Reputations made there are liable to become world wide. Good reputation and success are synonymous. The field is crowded; the competition tremendous. On top, however, is the traditional room.

There are several women now engaged in legitimate journalistic work in New York city who earn from fifty dollars a week to five and six thousand a year. For the most part their careers began outside the metropolis. Every newspaper has its regular staff to which naturally all assignments are given. Despite this regular corps of paid writers, however, every live editor is on the alert for "catchy," readable articles, irrespective of their source. Herein is the novice's loophole. Most editors are accessible. To one brute there are a hundred gentlemen. A personal interview is worth a bushel of correspondence. The advantage of being on the ground may be readily recognized. Letters of introduction are of little or no value, beyond a possible assurance of the bearer's reliability.

A timely article tersely, legibly written is the surest passport to editorial consideration. An editor wants to know what you can do. The estimate of your friends is immaterial to him. He is on the outlook for that which will make his paper sell. Women who bring to the editorial sanctum a personal tale of woe are doomed. Editors are human. Organized charity, however, relieves the modern editor from the lachrymose woman seeking pecuniary relief by the pen. If you have literary aspirations, ideals, smother them in the editorial presence. Literary ideals are a drug in the journalistic market. The successful journalist is he who caters to the reading public.

"I would not feel justified," said one of the greatest journalists, in response to a woman's application for foreign correspondence, "in asking even President Carnot to cable me a column." Telegraph and cable have somewhat lessened the value of foreign correspondence. The saying of Villemassant, the founder of The Figaro, that "a dog killed in the Boulevard was of more interest to the Parisian public than the death of an American statesman," is applicable, with modifications, to the readers of newspapers the world over, New York included.

The introduction of supplements or extra sheets on Sunday, and the woman's page or column, has opened a vast field for women writers. Many of the supplements are of high literary merit and the main revenue of much of the best literary talent of the day.

How does a writer learn an editor's wants? Mooted question! What is one's cure is another's disease. Study the principle, the scope of each paper. Scan daily telegraphic and cable dispatches. Watch the drift of public thought. An idea caught, typewrite it, deliver it in person to the editor you think most likely to take it. Rejected, try another. Keep on trying. It is immaterial to an editor how many places an article may have been submitted, provided he wants it. The editorial question is, "Will its publication sell an additional copy of the paper?" Less "clique," less favoritism, exists than is generally supposed.

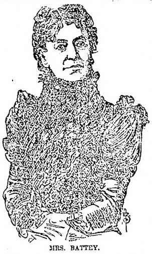
The modern editor seldom sacrifices a business interest to a personal whim. However charmed he may be with a woman's personality, selfishness rarely permits him to accept her services if it has not the salable quality. His reputation for shrewdness must be sustained, and therefore the editor, from pure selfishness, must accept and reject contributions on their merit solely, subject to the limitations of his own judgment. But of course all journals give their own staff the preference. It is only the exceptional, timely article, or an unexpected dearth of desirable matter that leads to the acceptance of unsolicited articles.

Women dislike space work. They prefer the certainty of a small competency to the uncertainty of large promise. This may not be a purely feminine characteristic. At all events staff positions are rarely won by outsiders without a course of training at space work. Such has been the experience of the majority of women who have succeeded in journalism.

"Journalism is fraught with so many dangers for women," says Mrs. Battey, who will shortly deliver a lecture on her "Twenty Years' Journalistic Experience," "that I never feel justified in encouraging a woman to enter it unless she feels driven to it by special talent or dire necessity. When I say dangers I do not refer particularly to virtue. Such imputations are nonsense. A woman may be as safe in journalism as in private life; but there are countless unforeseen, indefinable dangers upon which both men and women are liable to founder. Men do not care as a rule; women do."

Vast changes have taken place in woman's world since Mrs. Battey came to New York from the south twenty-two years ago with fifteen dollars in her pocket and began space work on various journals which eventually led to her influential power on the New York Sun. Mrs. Sallie Joy White, twenty years identified with the Boston press, has not found the work easy or the remuneration what it is often represented. "The girl, however, who craves a newspaper career," she says, "may undertake it with reasonable prospects of success if she has the qualifications of a writer—high health and habits of conscientious industry."

There's the rub; too many women devoid of these qualifications rush in to meet a Waterloo or join the army of "dead beat" scribblers. Harsh term, but apropos. New York has a growing quota of this journalistic fungus—women who "write up" each other, get their pictures in the paper at any price, and on the reputation of one signed article pay board bill, dressmaker, milliner and pose at the theater. Their number abroad is equally formidable. The majority have migrated from America. Such abuse of journalistic privilege happily is short lived.



MRS. BATTEY.

LIDA ROSE MCCABE.

M. G. McClelland, the story writer, is obliged to do her writing at night, since the pressure of housekeeping cares interrupts her constantly during the day. Her education has been rather desultory in its nature, as she has never attended school or had a governess in her life.

Some woman, giving advice to girls, says, "When you marry don't, under any but the most exceptional circumstances, consent to work for money." Wouldn't it be a good plan to let them do as they please about it?

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Kaufer took the train to-night for Forest River, Dak., where they will visit relatives a week.

Tuesday night was near the freezing point again, but the feeling of fear for the crop has now given way, as it is practically safe.

Mrs. O. M. Holmes, who was reported dying with quick consumption, is much improved, and strong hopes are entertained for her recovery.

The NEWS was the first paper to argue against the bonds. We stood quite alone for a time, but soon found our position supported on every side. Our efforts in behalf of the tax-payors was not the result of boodle--we did not wait for that. Drop in and subscribe—$1.50.

About fifty laborers arrived Monday morning to work on the G. N. H. W. Lee has taken a small contract on this end of the line.

Mrs. Ray of West Superior, is visiting at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Mercier.

Harvest hands get $2 and $2.50 a day.

Wheat, excepting late sown, is practically all cut.

Sportsmen are awaiting with baited breath the opening of the chickening season.

O. Noel of Louisville owns a lot on 3d st. He will build a house thereon and place two of his children therein this winter to attend school. In his district no school is held in the winter although that is the only season when the majority of farmers can spare their children for school. Mr. Noel has set a wise precedent which many other farmers would do well to follow.

Are you building up a library? Most people think they are, but it will never amount to much unless you add more than a couple of volumns a year to it. General Grant's Memoirs ought to be "in it," we think. You can get them—the same binding and make up as sold for $7—for 50 cents. See ad elsewhere. P. S.: Don't you think this is your chance.

Dolphis Champoux has a fine farm at Badger Creek. The farm is under a high state of cultivation. Badger Creek flows through it and there is some fine timber along its banks.

Mr. and Mrs. John Crawford returned from West Superior, Wis., yesterday morning. John will be wheat buyer at Barwell this winter.

Arthur Toupin is grading wheat at the North Side warehouse.

Joseph Allen arrived Tuesday from Blaine. Was. He will probably remain in Red Lake Falls. Says realestate on the coast is flat as a pancake. The lumbering business received a severe blow since the war in Chili, as that country was a regular patron. Altogether, times are dull out there, and Mr. A. is glad to get back to the "East."

Misses Maria Ralph and MarthaRiechel, Messrs. Wm. Ralph and Theophile La Bissoniere drove to Maple Lake Sunday, where they spent a lovely day; returnning the evening.

E. A. Moran and J. T. Knight were bound to to be on the safe side, so Saturday night they built fires on the wind ward side of their grain. No damage would have resulted any way, as the frost was very light, but on the other hand, such vigilance is an insurance against loss.

W. A. Schreiter and Lulu were at Grand Forks Friday.

Misses Sadie and Laurie Hempill, of Philadelphia, arrived in the city Friday morning. They will remain about two months, visiting at the home of their sister Mrs. F. E. Hunt.

Miss Martha Riechel leftMonday night for St. Paul. She will also visit at Faribault, Dundas and West Superior, and will remain five or six weeks.

Harry Greenleigh came up from Crookston Sunday evening to view Red Lake Falls.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Bourden arrived Sunday morning from Havre, Montana, where they have been for the past six months. The accident with which Mrs. Bourdon met a few months ago has left her in a slightly enfeebled condition. The many friends of the family are pleased to see them among us again.

Rev. Oefstadal and family were over from Fertile a couple of days last week. Mr. Oefstadal is a nephew of Rev. H. Lavik, of this place. The former gentleman made us a pleasant call.

Every resident subscriber ought to bring in at least one additional non-resident subscriber. Remember the premiums.

Jas. I. Wyer and C. C. Jackson are in town.

Frost Wednesday night, but no damage.

E. H. Draper has rigged up his threshing machine and is now ready for action.

The Poulliet family had a grand reunion Sunday at the old homestead. Mr. Poulliet Sr. and several members of the family had been away to Duluth for over a year.

School begins a week from Monday. The new teachers have not as yet put in an appearance.

Will Crawford was at the point of death with typhoid fever at St. Paul, but is better now.

Frank Cyr has been over from Duluth the past week. Frank has a baby two months old that weighs nearly twenty pounds. This is about all the particulars we have of Frank for this time, but it will do.

The following composed a party that drove to Terrebonne Sunday: Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Krost, Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Kaufer, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Duffy, Misses Tillie Kaufer, Lizzie Boyle and Phil A. Kaufer.

A correspondent who has probably been duped by a "traveling merchant" writes: "If our local merchants or grocers would let the people know as much about the prices of their goods through printer's ink as the traveling grocers and foreign merchants do by flooding the country with price lists, catalogues, etc., there would not be so many duped farmers or complaining merchants. The advertisers who put their goods and prices before the people and keep them there are the ones who will sell the goods. They may say when too late, 'I would have duplicated that bill of goods,' but they should have let the farmer who sent away and bought advertised goods of a foreign merchant know of it before he bought. That's the business of it.—Ex.

The wife of John Carlson was last week examined for insanity and sent to St. Peter. Mr. Carlson, wife and child resided at Emardville, a happy family, up to a few weeks ago, when the strange symptoms appeared. Mrs. Carlson is the mother of a bright girl baby a few months old and since its birth had not been well. The family sent to a Buffalo, N. Y., quack, for "six bottles for five dollars" patent remedy, which Mrs. Carlson began taking. Before a bottle had been used she begun to show signs at times of not being altogether right; however, not suspecting the cause, she continued the use of Dr. ——'s remedy and steadily grew worse. At times she was seized with fits of hysteria, laughing and crying for days at a time. There is little doubt that the patent medicine accidentally took effect in her system in this manner. The baby has been taken into the home of C. Anderson. Mr. Carlson has the sympathy of his neighbors, who will do all they can for the motherless babe.

The Duluth News says: "It is possible the majority of people do not know that there exists a strip of country seventy two miles long and one and one half miles wide which does not come within the jurisdiction of any county—a place where crime cannot be punished, mortgages foreclosed or attachments issued. Il is a fact, nevertheless, and Judge Stearns has passed on that very question in an action brought to collect taxes. This is how it came about: when Polk county was organized its northern boundary was drawn from the point where the Turtle River empties into the Red River of the North. Marshall county was organized later, its southern boundary being fixed at the township line a mile and a half above the Polk county line. This was done under the mistaken impression that the township line and not the place of confluence of the two rivers was the northern boundary of Polk county: as these two counties extend east and west 72 miles, this leaves a narrow strip, all that distance, between the two counties, unorganized and out of all jurisdiction.

Our reporter took a drive to Terrebonne Sunday. The country between here and there is one of the garden spots of Northern Minnesota. The road winds about the Clearwater river bank for some distance, giving an exquisite view of woodland on one hand, and prairie on the other. The farmers are all well-fixed in this district, most of them having neat, comfortable houses and good barns. Six miles out is Badger Creek—a settlement on the banks of a clear creek, of prosperous farmers. The land is pretty much under cultivation, and the grain, about half of which was cut, is of even excellence, the average yield and quality better than ever before. Signs of prosperity smile on you as you go. Terrebonne has a neat schoolhouse and church, a fine flouring mill, blacksmith shop and several general merchandise stores, Ovide Moreau being proprietor of the leading store. Ovide always has a cordial reception for visitors and is said to be one of the most popular men in the district. The country throughout bears the impress of prosperity, and shows that the primitive days of absolute self-denial are forever passed.

The English royal princesses have set the fashion for sisters not only to dress alike when they are unmarried, but to continue to do so after becoming wives.

Thomas Hackett, of Reed Station, Ind., amused himself by tossing up a silver dollar and catching it in his mouth until the coin lodged in his throat. A surgical operation was necessary to remove it.

One hundred and seventy head of cattle are ordered to be killed in Yorkshire, England, where pleuropneumonia is raging. It will take ten days to slaughter the animals, and the loss to the owners will exceed $17,000.

A musician in New York says the orchestral music at theatres has become so bad that people go out between acts to escape it. They come back wiping their lips as though they had taken some sort of medicine to dull their hearing.
